MAJOR DEVELOPMENTS

In 1999, the refugee situation remained stable throughout North Africa, with no emergencies developing in the area. Pending voluntary repatriation or other longterm solutions, UNHCR continued to provide protection and limited material assistance to refugees and other people of concern to the Office in Algeria, the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (Libya), Mauritania, Morocco and Tunisia. The overall security situation in Algeria improved over the course of the year. Although some restrictions continued to be applied to all UN staff and operations in the country, these did not adversely affect UNHCR's activities there. The programme of assistance to Western Saharan refugees continued, mainly in Algeria and Mauritania, as did the Office's close involvement in the UN Settlement Plan for Western Sahara (see separate chapter on the Western Sahara Operation). The lifting of the international embargo on Libya had a beneficial effect on the economy and ushered in a more tolerant attitude towards the refugees there, particularly regarding employment and access to social services. In Mauritania, the situation at the border with Mali remained precarious owing to sporadic security incidents, but there was no displacement of populations. Despite improvements in some areas, UNHCR maintained emergency preparedness in all the countries in the region.

CHALLENGES AND CONCERNS

With the exception of Libya, which is a party only to the 1969 OAU Convention, all countries in the region have acceded to the 1951 Convention and the 1967 Protocol. UNHCR's principal challenge in the region is to assist the authorities to establish bodies and procedures to assess claims to refugee status. The other challenge is to find a long-term solution for the Western Saharan refugees. In 1999, implementation of the UN Settlement Plan was delayed by continued political differences between Morocco and the Frente Popular para la Liberación de la Saguia el-Hamra y de Río de Oro (the POLISARIO Front).

PROGRESS TOWARDS SOLUTIONS

All UNHCR offices worked closely with the relevant authorities of the countries in the region. Seminars and workshops on refugee status determination and international law were used to sensitise officials to UNHCR's mandate and the legal framework for its activities. UNHCR also supported national capacity-building to respond to the needs of asylum-seekers and refugees. Durable solutions were identified and implemented. For example, 41 Malian refugees repatriated from Algeria and 122 Somali refugees repatriated from Libya in 1999 with UNHCR's assistance. Yet the region remains a strategic crossroads for refugee and migratory movements, principally from south to north. Pending repatriation to the Territory of Western Sahara, the first major phase of the pre-registration of Western Saharan refugees was completed.

OPERATIONS

In Algeria, UNHCR continued to provide assistance to 80,000 vulnerable Western Saharan refugees (mostly women and children), out of the 165,000 (estimated by the Government) living in the four camps in Tindouf. The pre-registration for repatriation (which began in 1997) continued in the camps, with some 107,000 refugees registered by the end of 1999. UNHCR also assisted 290 urban refugees, including 146 Malians, of whom 41 were repatriated in 1999. Furthermore, UNHCR helped urban asylum-seekers, mainly from sub-Saharan Africa, to apply for refugee status and intervened when necessary on behalf of individuals at risk of expulsion. UNHCR also promoted greater understanding of refugee law within the academic community.

In Libya, UNHCR had overall responsibility for the protection of some 7,600 Palestinian refugees, of whom 700 (generally vulnerable individuals and families) received financial and other assistance. In addition, of almost 3,000 Somali refugees, UNHCR assisted 467 and repatriated 122 of them by air, after obtaining clearance from the authorities of northern Somalia.

Pending durable solutions for refugees in Mauritania, UNHCR's interventions with the authorities enabled urban refugees living in Nouakchott (346 refugees from Sierra Leone) to circulate freely and go about their activities. The Lomé Peace Accord signed in July 1999, raised hopes that these refugees might eventually be able to repatriate. The Office in Mauritania also pre-registered just over 26,000 Western Saharans for repatriation.

In Morocco, UNHCR assisted some 140 refugees of various nationalities, based on an assessment of their needs. These included food, shelter, reimbursement of medical expenses, French language training, education for refugee children and related transport. Twenty-nine refugee children were helped to go to primary and secondary school. Ten refugees were enrolled in Moroccan universities.

In Tunisia, UNHCR assisted 157 refugees (out of some 450 refugees in the country) in 1999, giving priority to women and children. Local integration remained difficult for most of the refugees, who were not granted residence permits and were therefore unable to obtain work permits. UNHCR continued to advocate the adoption of national refugee legislation and procedures for refugee status determination.

FUNDING

The region had sufficient resources to implement its planned activities, including protection and assistance and work in Algeria and Mauritania preparatory to the repatriation of Western Saharan refugees.
