Highlights

In the absence of a political solution, the humanitarian situation in Yemen continues to deteriorate. In search of safety and livelihoods, over 2.8 million people continue to be on the move in Yemen. With their safety nets depleted, as savings dwindle and remittances from abroad dry up, more people are moving to makeshift and spontaneous settlements and are turning to negative coping strategies for survival. The added stresses on host communities are also increasing as the economy collapses. The movement of people is also increasing out of Yemen with over 175,000 fleeing across borders in the region. UNOCHA

Last year 2015, 30,202 people made the journey across the gulf of Aden and the Arabian sea to Somalia of which 2,413 persons arrived until end of June 2016 to Bossaso, Berbera, Mogadishu, and other ports within (1,550 Somali returnee, 823 Yemenis and 40 from other nationalities) arrived in 2016

Response

UNHCR provides information to arrivals about the registration, and facilitates the prioritization of people with specific needs and people with disabilities. Also providing regular advice and support to authorities during the initial registration process.

Partners are engaged in a broad array of activities, including pre-positioning of supplies; increasing assessment, monitoring and evaluation efforts; reinforcing coordination and information-sharing structures; and responding to emerging needs. However, funding has been limited, forcing actors to re-orient financing from other programs.

Funding Update

Somali Returnees from Yemen

In 2015, Yemen hosted approximately 246,000 registered refugees. The majority of them (95%) were ethnic Somalis. Somalia is receiving boat people arriving to the sea-port in Berbera, Bossaso and other ports, where among war refugees there are many ethnic Somalis from different regions of Somalia. In the self-declared states of Somaliland and Somalia undergo the process of verification of their nationality by the clan elders, while those who have no grounds to claim such nationality are regarded as third country nationals by the authorities.
