Peacebuilding Commission

Second session

Guinea-Bissau configuration

Report of the mission of the Peacebuilding Commission to Guinea-Bissau

6-11 April 2008

I. Background

1. A delegation of the Guinea-Bissau configuration of the Peacebuilding Commission visited Guinea-Bissau from 6 to 11 April 2008. The purposes of the mission and key message, the full programme of the mission and the composition of the delegation are contained in annexes I, III and IV.

2. The delegation met with the President; the Prime Minister; the Speaker of Parliament; the Minister for Foreign Affairs; the Ministers of Defence, Justice, Administration Reform, Economy, Social Solidarity, Health, Education, Culture, Youth and Sports, and Veterans' Affairs; the Secretary of State for International Cooperation; and the General Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces. It also held meetings with the diplomatic community, the United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Guinea-Bissau (UNOGBIS), the United Nations country team, the National Steering Committee, the National Electoral Commission, civil society, including non-governmental organizations and the private sector, and political parties. The content of the meetings are contained in annex II.

3. The delegation visited several sites in and outside of Bissau, which illustrated some of the peacebuilding challenges faced by the country. These sites included a mine-clearance project in Bissau; a women's group agricultural project; a cashew nut processing plant; the electrical power plants in Bissau and Bafata; military barracks in Bissau and in Canchungo; a bridge construction area in Porto São Vicente; the premises of the judiciary police and the prison in Bissau; and a hospital in Canchungo.

4. The members of the delegation wish to express their appreciation to the Government of Guinea-Bissau and the United Nations team on the ground for their support and assistance during the visit.

II. Assessment

5. The meetings with various interlocutors were instrumental for the delegation to gain a better understanding of the current situation and to offer recommendations for the engagement of the Commission in developing an integrated peacebuilding strategy. Many problems faced by Guinea-Bissau stemmed from the prevailing institutional fragility of the State, constraining the Government from effectively managing key aspects of public, political, security and development policies and from delivering basic public services to the population. That situation had led to difficulties in implementing policies and programmes that could allow much needed political stability and economic recovery.

6. There was a vicious cycle in which the absence of responses to the most elementary needs of the population set the conditions for political instability, which in turn increased the vulnerability of the already fragile State. The consolidation of civilian rule was viewed by the delegation as one of the most important indicators of successful peacebuilding in the country. Consequently, the delegation believed that the country needed political stability and a strong commitment to continuing the reforms in the economic, social and political spheres as a way of guaranteeing sustainable peace, sustained growth and development.

7. The delegation found that the Government had high expectations regarding the Commission and hoped its engagement with the Commission would bring tangible results. From a political point of view, the Commission could contribute to ensuring greater stability, while it consolidated its stance as a reliable intermediary between the Government and its bilateral and international partners.

8. The delegation was of the view that the process of national reconciliation would be greatly enhanced if the key challenges were properly addressed with a strong political will among the leaders of the country and the support of the international community. Similarly, the delegation recognized the need to boost the country's efforts in capacity-building, in particular institutional capacity-building, translating the Government's political commitment to the peacebuilding efforts into concrete actions.

9. In the light of the increased attention currently being given to the country, as well as the likely increase in donor activity, the delegation stressed the need to improve donor coordination mechanisms to allow for better coordination of assistance by the international community and other stakeholders in supporting the country in its peacebuilding efforts. The establishment of an integrated peacebuilding strategy should strengthen coordination among various actors on the ground, by avoiding a duplication of efforts, thus creating synergies and mobilizing additional resources.

III. Conclusions and recommendations

10. The delegation identified, through its interactions with the Government, the following key areas for priority attention: elections; security sector reform; rule of law and the fight against drug trafficking; illegal migration and other forms of transnational organized criminal activities; public administration reform; reactivation of the economy; and rebuilding of the infrastructure, in particular in the energy sector.

11. Given the urgency and magnitude of many of the problems faced by Guinea-Bissau, the delegation concluded that the peacebuilding strategy should be based on a two-track approach, combining strategic planning with quick-impact projects. In this connection, it was reasonable that urgency, importance and value-added be the criteria for selection of quick-win projects. At the same time, the delegation recognized that the following criteria for assistance would also be useful: (a) contribution to promoting stability; (b) contribution to sustained socio-economic growth and development to enable the country to stand on its own feet; and (c) contribution to job creation.

Elections

12. The date for the forthcoming parliamentary elections had been set for 16 November 2008. Most interlocutors agreed that preparations for the elections were lagging behind, notably with respect to the national census, voter registration and the civic education campaign. The rainy season, which had already started and would end just before the elections, could further complicate the preparations for the process. A major potential constraint to holding the elections, however, was the lack of financial support for the preparations and holding of the elections. Financial assistance was needed to pay the salary arrears from the previous elections and to pay for the preparations for the November elections. The total budget for the 2008 elections amounted to $8.677 million, comprising $2.67 million for voter registration; $4.23 million for costs covered by the National Electoral Commission; and $1.76 million for electoral arrears. Out of that sum, Government sovereignty costs (salaries, arrears and diaspora voter registration) amounted to $4.320 million.

13. The Peacebuilding Commission could play an important role in galvanizing bilateral and international partners and in mobilizing additional resources to fill the funding gap; and UNOGBIS could play a role in assisting in the organization of sensitization campaigns, which could provide the opportunity for a meaningful political dialogue involving all political forces in Guinea-Bissau. The possibility of extending in due time an invitation to external elections observers was also raised. It was felt that the Guinea-Bissau configuration could hold a specific meeting to discuss the issue of the elections.

Security sector reform

14. The delegation held a separate meeting with the Ministers of Defence and Justice on the ongoing security sector reform plan. The Ministers emphasized that the Government's priorities for security sector reform included restructuring and modernization of the current security forces. The continued subordination of the military to civilian control and the Government's commitment to reduce the size of the armed forces were considered as some of the most important aspects of peacebuilding in Guinea-Bissau.

15. The restructuring of the security forces would lead to an army size appropriate to the needs and means of the country. That size was estimated to be around 3,500 soldiers, excluding the paramilitary forces and the police (judiciary police and border patrol). The census of the country's security forces had been concluded and the results would be made public after they had been analysed by the relevant authorities.<sup>1</sup> Those demobilized as part of the restructuring would need to be provided with alternative economic activities, including the possible use of microcredit instruments.

16. As part of the modernization of the security forces, an immediate priority was to address their living conditions. A visit to the barracks in Bissau and Bafata gave the delegation a better appreciation for the poor living conditions in the barracks and of the urgent need to address them.

17. Next month, the Department of Peacekeeping Operations would conduct a full mapping exercise of the security sector reform activities under way in Guinea-Bissau, followed by an assessment mission to the country, with a special focus on the criminal and justice system. At the same time, there was recognition that the European Commission/European Union was providing considerable support in that area, both in the short and the medium to long term.

18. The delegation was of the view that the successful implementation of the Government's security sector reform plan was crucial to the country's stability. The delegation stressed that further efforts should be made to support the Government in pushing through its reforms in that sector and that the Commission might consider specific areas where it could play a value-added role.

Rule of law and combating drug trafficking, illegal migration and other forms of transnational organized criminal activities

19. The growing problem of drug trafficking and transnational organized crime in Guinea-Bissau was closely linked to the need to reform the security forces. The country's weak capacity to control its isolated and dispersed islands, maritime borders and airspace had made it easy for drug traffickers to infiltrate the country and establish transit bases for drugs on their way from South America to Europe. Other forms of transnational illegal activities, including illegal migration, had taken advantage of the weak and ineffective security forces.

20. The delegation believed that addressing the shortcomings in the country's security forces would greatly reduce illegal activities. As part of that effort, the delegation also emphasized the need to strengthen the country's judicial system, including the judiciary police and the country's detention facilities. Ongoing efforts by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime were acknowledged as an important basis for further complementary action on the part of the international community. All efforts to address drug trafficking and related crimes should include a regional perspective, given the transnational nature of the challenges in that area.

Reform of public administration

21. Public administration reform was one of the key priorities of the Government. The Government's public sector reform programme had three components: enhancement of the professional competence of the public administration through training and capacity-building; improvement of public finance management; and improvement of public sector systems and procedures.

<sup>1</sup> Since the completion of the mission, Government authorities have announced the results of the census. The military forces are composed of 4,483 personnel. There is a relatively large proportion of high-ranking officers.

22. A lack of adequate capacity had hindered the Government's ability to deliver basic social services, while the large size of its public administration had created difficulties in paying salaries to civil servants. Clearing the backlog of salary arrears was as an indispensable step in public sector reform.

23. The modernization and strengthening of the public sector required a substantial increase in the current fiscal base, which in turn depended upon an effective process of reactivation of the economy and the creation of a business-friendly environment.

Energy

24. The Government faced an energy crisis. Not a single generator was working properly at the electric power plant in Bissau. The current output was provided by three leased generators, which only provided a minimal amount of electricity. Total production of energy reached 2.5 megawatts, while the current demand amounted to 20 megawatts, exclusively for the capital.

25. In a meeting with the World Bank and other stakeholders engaged in the energy sector, the importance of Private investment and private-public partnerships in the energy sector was stressed. It was pointed out, however, that, while such an approach was legally possible, Guinea-Bissau needed to improve the current regulatory framework, based on the principles of transparency and efficiency. A project was being developed to exploit natural and hydropower through the construction of a dam on the Gambia River, with the support of the European Union and the African Development Bank. Two round tables had been held and had raised 65 per cent of the funds needed for the project, which amounted to a total of €1 billion. The project could start in 2008-2009 and could be finished within four to five years. The expected contribution of Guinea-Bissau to the regional project would amount to €8 million. Once completed, the project would only provide the energy needed for the short and medium term. Since demand would rise in the rest of the city and the country, however, additional sources of energy would have to be identified.

26. The World Bank and the European Commission were also funding a master plan to identify and facilitate partnerships with additional partners and stakeholders. The European Commission was investing in domestic and alternative sources of energy through a regional project. The total cost of the strategy and the master plan amounted to €29 million. The European Commission was providing €4 million for a pumping system with solar energy and an additional €3 million for a water treatment facility powered by solar energy.

27. The delegation recognized that, while the lack of energy in Bissau and the total absence of energy in the rest of the country was seriously hampering the country's economic development, numerous ongoing and planned activities were aimed at addressing those shortcomings. It was necessary to improve distribution services so as to ensure that the electricity produced in Bissau was adequately monitored and controlled against misuse and diversion.

Reactivation of the economy and social areas

28. In spite of the huge challenges, Guinea-Bissau was a country with great economic potential, especially in the agriculture and fisheries sectors. To attract investment, both local and international, however, the Government would need to overcome a number of obstacles, notably in the area of economic governance, as well as improve legal and financial frameworks. The reactivation of the economy called for an effective reform of the public sector, combined with measures to diversify and add value to local products. Such an effort necessarily involved dealing with the infrastructure bottlenecks, creating an enabling environment for business and providing capacity-building for human resources. Sustained support from the international community to match Government efforts would enable the country to embark on a path of stability, recovery and development.

29. A well-functioning economy would allow for an enhanced fiscal base, which in turn could strengthen the structure of the State and create the conditions for the Government to address the manifold needs of the population in the social areas. Many interlocutors reiterated the importance of adequate health and education services for the maintenance of peace in the long term.

30. As part of the effort to reactivate the economy, Government officials requested the support of the Commission to ensure that Guinea-Bissau was accorded debt relief on more generous conditions, taking into account its post-conflict situation. Such debt relief would enable the country to devote more resources to infrastructure and poverty reduction programmes.

Annex I

Purposes of the mission and key message

Purposes of the mission

1. The purposes of the mission were:
  - (a) To engage with the Government of Guinea-Bissau and other key stakeholders;
  - (b) To discuss with the Government and other stakeholders the Government's main priorities, challenges and risks for peacebuilding in the country, the actions being undertaken by the Government to address those challenges and the nature and scope of international support needed by the country;
  - (c) To visit the sites of ongoing projects in and outside of Bissau that were relevant to peacebuilding in the country; and
  - (d) To exchange views on the activities of the Peacebuilding Fund and on the establishment of the National Steering Committee.

Key message

2. The delegation stressed the importance of coordination and partnership between all stakeholders; and the importance of making progress on the strategic framework for peacebuilding in Guinea-Bissau as the tool for long-term engagement between the Government and all relevant stakeholders, based on the principles of national ownership, mutual accountability, sustained engagement and inclusiveness. It further explained the mandate and processes of the Peacebuilding Commission and its interrelation with the Peacebuilding Fund process, the importance of continuity and stability in Guinea-Bissau and the Government's sustained commitment to the process.

Annex II

Content of meetings

Government ministers and senior officials

1. The delegation met with the following: the Ministers of Defence, Justice, Administration Reform, Economy, Social Solidarity, Health, Education, Culture, Youth and Sports, and Veterans' Affairs, and the Secretary of State for International Cooperation.

2. The Government Ministers expressed their gratitude for the engagement of the Peacebuilding Commission with Guinea-Bissau and thanked the partners for their sustained commitment over the years. They expressed their support for the work of the Commission, in particular its Guinea-Bissau configuration. They also expressed their full confidence in the Chairperson of the Guinea-Bissau configuration. The Ministers expressed satisfaction with the Secretary-General's decision to declare Guinea-Bissau eligible for support from the Peacebuilding Fund, which served as an additional motivation for the Government and impetus for the engagement between the Commission and the Government of Guinea-Bissau. The Ministers also stressed their political will and continued commitment to work together with all the partners.

3. The Ministers stated that the Government was focusing on a number of peacebuilding priority areas, including the forthcoming legislative elections, set to take place on 16 November; the reform of the security sector, the reform of the public administration sector, the energy sector, and drug trafficking and other transnational organized crime, such as human trafficking and terrorism. While other issues of concern were raised, the aforementioned areas were accorded very high priority by the Ministers.

4. Preparations for the November elections had been delayed as a result of a funding gap and a delayed response on the part of the various stakeholders, including a delay in the finalization of the consensual budget. Neither the national census, nor voter registration had started yet. The Government's decision to opt for a biometric system meant that efforts would need to be intensified to acquire the necessary equipment and deploy it for the registration well in advance of the elections. If voter registration was not completed on time, the 2005 voter registry would have to be used. Bilateral and multilateral partners had been approached to help with the funding of the elections, to little avail. A copy of the electoral budget was presented to the delegation for information. The Government had allocated 1.9 billion CFA francs to contribute to the budgetary gap, which included outstanding salary arrears and the census of the Bissau-Guinean diaspora. A total of 0.6 billion CFA francs had already been included in the 2008 budget. The Government's sovereignty costs amounted to $4.320 million, although it was unclear how it intended to fund that amount.

5. The delegation was assured that the Parliament would continue its regular activities after the end of its mandate on 21 April. According to Government representatives, the Parliament would continue its work through its permanent commissions, notwithstanding the resolution adopted by Parliament extending its own mandate until the holding of the November elections. The delegation emphasized the need to respect constitutional procedures as a necessary condition for stability and an orderly political process.<sup>a</sup>

6. Regarding security sector reform, the Ministers clarified that it included a disarmament, demobilization and reintegration component and that selection criteria for members of the security forces to be included in the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme had been identified. The need to ensure alternative economic activities for the military to be demobilized was also much emphasized. The army had conducted a census that would provide greater clarity in terms of the size of the army. The findings of the census and the possible adjustments of the Government's security sector reform plan would be shared with the international community in due course.

7. In the area of economic development, the Ministers emphasized the need to urgently address the deficiencies in the energy sector. The point was made that there could be no development without energy. Only a few neighbourhoods in Bissau currently had access to electricity, while the rest of the country relied heavily on small generators. Another area that required immediate attention was agriculture, which, if developed, could provide employment for the youth and sustainable food security. The country was currently an importer of basic food items. Resources were needed to support the agricultural sector. The need to strengthen capacities through training, including for demobilized soldiers, was stressed.

8. The Ministers emphasized that the Government was actively engaged in the fight against international organized crime, in particular drug trafficking, despite its very limited capacities to control its land territory, its maritime borders and air space. Those constraints made the country particularly vulnerable to transnational organized crime, including drug trafficking, human trafficking and illegal migration, terrorism and trafficking in small arms and light weapons. While it was the State's responsibility to guarantee the control of its borders and the safety of its territory, it was also noted that that alone would not help address those problems, which needed to be tackled at the regional and subregional levels. A regional conference on combating drug trafficking was expected to be held later in the year, under the auspices of the Economic Community of West African States.

9. According to the Ministers, the measures the Government had deployed against drug traffickers, although limited, had led to a dramatic decrease in the number of potential traffickers in the country. The Government could ascertain that the overall number of illegal landings had decreased and that there had been no illegal landings at the country's main landing strips (Bissau, Bubaque and Cufar). One of the most effective measures had been to set up physical obstacles on the landing strips. A limited level of military presence had also been deployed in and around the airports.

10. Problems with illegal migration were due to the geography of the country, which had around 90 islands, out of which only 17 were inhabited. Some of those that were not inhabited and were difficult to access were being used for illegal migration.

<sup>a</sup> Subsequent to the departure of the delegation, the National Parliament adopted a resolution amounting to a revision of the constitution, essentially extending the Parliament's mandate until elections could be held in November.

11. The threat of terrorism had come to light more prominently with the deportation to Mauritania of the alleged murderers of the French tourists. One of the two extradited Mauritians spoke Creole, indicating that he had been in the country long enough to learn the language. The Government had not shown complacency when facing the situation regarding the terrorists, despite its very limited resources. The Government expressed concern that the terrorists, who had committed their acts far away from Bissau, had not been caught before reaching the country. A meeting was expected to be held soon in Dakar on the regional and subregional dimension of the terrorist threat.

12. In that context, the Minister of Justice and the Director of the Judiciary Police outlined their priorities, which included improvement of the existing infrastructure, bringing the quality of services up to international standards and pursuing partnerships with bilateral and multilateral partners. The Government lacked the financial means to implement its programme in that sector. The authorities of the country were hampered in their fight against organized crime, notably drug trafficking, by the absence of appropriate facilities, such as prisons, and the lack of appropriate legal human resources, such as magistrates. There was an urgent need to address those immediate needs in the infrastructure to reduce impunity and allow for magistrates to conduct their work. Magistrates were currently reluctant to hand out sentences for lack of appropriate prison facilities.

13. The judiciary police was not in a position to move into their new facilities because the facilities had not yet been reconfigured for their future function. The move would allow the old facilities to be improved and the current prison to be enlarged and brought up to international standards. The judiciary police did not have the means to purchase furniture and office equipment for the new facilities.

14. The Government had made some progress towards national reconciliation. One of the elements of the process was the draft amnesty law, which had been submitted to the President for promulgation. The Government was of the view that the improvement of the socio-economic situation in the country would contribute to further national reconciliation. In that regard, the Government's priorities were the creation of wealth, the creation of jobs and the fight against illiteracy. If progress could be made on those three fronts, socio-economic stability could be achieved. In particular, the agricultural sector needed to be supported since it would allow for the creation of many jobs.

15. The Minister of Finance indicated that all domestic revenues in the country were directed towards payment of the salaries of civil servants, leaving no resources for public investments. While acknowledging the need to pursue public sector reform, he noticed that the diversification of the economy and the consequent expansion of the revenue base were indispensable steps. The Minister of Finance called attention to the high levels of indebtedness of Guinea-Bissau and asked for the support of the Commission in speeding up the process that would make the country benefit from the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries initiative.

Diplomatic community and briefing by the European Union on the security sector reform European security and defence policy mission

16. The diplomatic community highlighted a number of challenges facing the country, including the lack of a critical mass of technical expertise in various fields, the need to implement quickly the country's security sector reform and the upcoming elections.

17. With respect to the end of the mandate of the Parliament, the diplomatic community stressed the importance of making sure that a solution be found, giving due respect to the law and the constitution.

18. The importance of strengthened donor coordination was highlighted. It was recognized, however, that the proper functioning of such a mechanism might be hampered by the lack of adequate staff capacities in some of the local embassies and institutions. The international partners group, coordinated by the United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office in Guinea-Bissau, should try to hold more frequent meetings. A suggestion was also made to use the National Steering Committee, which had already been established.

19. The delegation stressed that the Peacebuilding Commission was not an additional donor or provider of funds, but rather a mechanism to assess the needs of the country and to help address them by developing a strategic framework for peacebuilding in Guinea-Bissau.

20. France, which currently held the local presidency of the European Union in Bissau, made a presentation to the delegation on the upcoming security sector reform European security and defence policy mission. In addition, the European Commission had set aside €7.7 million for the reintegration and reinsertion of demobilized combatants. Out of that total, €4 million were earmarked for reinsertion, €1.2 million for former combatants and €0.5 million for cross-cutting measures. The remainder would cover technical and administrative costs. The completion of the census of the armed forces would provide a more accurate picture of the real needs and of the importance of the problem.

Civil society organizations and the private sector

21. The delegation held separate meetings with civil society organizations representing, among others, women, youth and former combatants, and representatives of the private sector and it stressed the crucial role of civil society in the definition and implementation of an integrated peacebuilding strategy. The women's organizations regretted the lack of consideration given to women's groups by the Government and stressed that women were particularly disadvantaged in the Bissau-Guinean society. Illiteracy rates were higher among women, as were the rates of HIV-AIDS infections. Infant and maternal mortality rates were very high, and women were more often victims of gender-based violence, human rights abuses and traditional practices.

22. In the workplace, women were underprivileged and underrepresented and those who worked were hired at lower levels and with lower salaries than men. Women's organizations recommended that women be represented at all levels of decision-making, that they be included in the National Steering Committee and that gender issues be included in all areas of the Government's work. It was also recommended that special attention be paid to gender in the area of capacity-building.

23. Non-governmental organization representatives indicated that the judiciary was not able to effectively combat corruption and impunity and was not able to provide basic services to the population, which had led elements of the population to take justice into their own hands. Political instability was highlighted as a major constraint.

24. Civil society organizations were also concerned about illegal migration, drug trafficking, juvenile delinquency and youth unemployment. In the latter case, the Government had adopted in December 2007 a plan of action for youth, which had not yet been implemented. The plan of action reflected the specific needs of the youth in all sectors, including in the areas of education, training and employment generating activities, youth participation in decision-making, public administration and security sector reform.

25. With respect to security sector reform, the non-governmental organizations stressed the importance of ensuring a reform with dignity, which would include moral recognition and material and financial security for demobilized and retired soldiers. They feared that the way the reform was being conducted would not achieve the desired result and would fail as it had in all previous attempts. To avoid a repetition of mistakes associated with previous security sector reforms, non-governmental organizations suggested that a pilot project be conducted in the area of security sector reform, if successful, it could be applied to the rest of the army.

26. The representatives of the private sector indicated that the merger of the two chambers of commerce in Guinea-Bissau had enhanced the status and role of the private sector in the country. They noted that the private sector was increasingly looked upon as the engine of growth and the source of job creation in the country and hoped that the Peacebuilding Commission would help the private sector to play those roles effectively.

27. The representatives highlighted several constraints and challenges that impeded the growth and development of the private sector in the country. One of the major challenges lay in the banking and finance sector. There were few banks in the country and they focused mainly on short-term commercial lending, making it very difficult for private firms to obtain loans for medium- to long-term investments. To overcome that problem, Guinea-Bissau needed to establish a development bank that would lend to entrepreneurs with medium- to long-term investment horizons.

28. Another major constraint to private sector development was the lack of an adequate and reliable energy supply, which had not only stifled industrial and commercial production but had also discouraged private investment in many sectors of the economy. Overcoming the constraint of an inadequate energy supply required a composite of measures, including rehabilitating existing power plants; encouraging private sector participation in the generation, transmission and distribution of power; diversifying the sources of energy supply to encompass use of solar panels and of cashew nut shells to produce electricity; and improving the legal and regulatory framework for the power sector.

29. Other important constraints identified as hindering the growth of the private sector included the weakness of the judicial system and overall rule of law guarantees, the high air and maritime transport costs, unreliable communications, lack of effective policy in support of the agriculture sector and the absence of supportive public policies and public institutions for business.

National Steering Committee<sup>b</sup>

30. The co-Chairs of the National Steering Committee — the Minister in the Presidency, representing the Government of Guinea-Bissau, and the Representative of the Secretary-General, representing the United Nations — offered their perspectives on the role of the Committee. They emphasized that the work of the Committee would be guided by the principles of national ownership, partnership and mutual accountability and that decisions would reflect the priorities and challenges for peacebuilding, as set by the Government of Guinea-Bissau. In doing so, the Committee would collaborate with all the national stakeholders that were engaged in dialogue with the Peacebuilding Commission.

31. The co-Chairs expressed confidence that the Committee's work would support the joint efforts of the Government and the Peacebuilding Commission to consolidate peacebuilding in the country. They indicated that a meeting of the Committee would be held within a week to examine and adopt its terms of reference and rules of procedure.

32. The members of the delegation observed that the Committee was an important tool in carrying out the work of the Commission in the field. The main tasks of the Committee included contributing to the definition of the priorities for peacebuilding; assessment of the projects submitted for funding to ensure that they fit with the country's peacebuilding priorities; and deepening consultations with various stakeholders engaged in the peacebuilding process in the country. It was stressed that an inclusive approach was essential to the Committee's functioning and effectiveness, in particular ensuring active civil society participation in the Committee's decision-making and improved gender balance in representation and participation. Such an inclusive approach was considered vital to ensuring the transparency of and trust in the work of the Committee.

Political parties

33. The delegation canvassed the views of the country's political parties on the current political situation, the electoral preparation, the priorities for peacebuilding and their expectations from the Peacebuilding Commission process. The delegation met the representatives of the two minority parties (see annex III), as well as with the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde, the United Social Democratic Party and the Party for Social Renewal, which formed the coalition Government.

34. Minority leaders focused their intervention on the situation arising from the adoption of a resolution on the prolongation of the mandate of the Parliament. The leaders of the minority parties stressed the importance of finding a solution in

- (a) Government representatives (5): Minister of Defence; Minister of Public Administration; Minister of Economy and Regional Integration; Secretary of State for International Cooperation; Representative of the Presidency of the Republic;
- (b) Bilateral partners (5): Brazil, China, Portugal, South Africa, Spain;
- (c) Multilateral partners (5): United Nations Development Programme Resident Representative/United Nations Resident Coordinator, European Commission, Economic Community of West African States, World Bank, African Development Bank;
- (d) Civil society and the private sector (3): two representatives of civil society and one representative of the joint Chamber of Commerce.

accordance with the law. The resolution passed in Parliament to extend their mandate was unconstitutional. Minority leaders stressed that the current tranquillity was precarious.

35. The coalition parties that formed the Government stressed the urgency of receiving substantial support from the international community for the upcoming elections. They agreed with the priorities established by the Government, notably on security sector reform, youth, institution-building and the rehabilitation of the existing infrastructure. Other Government priorities included payment of salary arrears, education, food security, the health sector, reform of the public administration sector, maritime resource control and transportation problems.

36. The Government parties were of the view that their decision to adopt a resolution in Parliament extending their mandate until the new elections were held was the best solution to the problem and provided continuity in the work of the Parliament. However, one of the parties regretted that there had not been sufficient consultations among the parties before the resolution had been tabled for a vote. Ultimately, the Supreme Court would have to decide, should problems arise as a result of the resolution adopted by Parliament.

37. One of the Government parties noted that all the previous Governments of Guinea-Bissau had not been able to exercise enough civilian control and oversight over the military and security forces, which systematically interfered in the country's political life, because of the legacy of their leadership role in the liberation struggle. That remark echoed similar remarks made by the civil society representatives.

Other national institutions

38. The President of the National Electoral Commission welcomed the decision by the President of the Republic to set the date of the elections for 16 November 2008, which would coincide with the end of the rainy season. The National Electoral Commission was concerned about the delay in starting the national census and updating the national voter registry. The delays could result in the Government's having to use the data available from the last census dating back to 2005. The National Electoral Commission stressed that it was the Government's responsibility to act as quickly as possible.

39. The National Electoral Commission also noted the delays in starting the civic education programme, which were due in part to the funding gap for the elections in general. Further concerns were expressed with regard to the salary arrears, dating back to the 1999, 2004 and 2005 elections. A separate census needed to be organized for the Bissau-Guinean diaspora, estimated at around 144,000. Elections for the diaspora were conducted through the country's consulates abroad. Those issues needed to be addressed as a matter of priority.

40. The delegation stressed the need for the National Electoral Commission to request formally, and in due time, the participation of international observers since the date of the elections had been set.

41. The delegation held a meeting with General Tagme Na Waie, Army Chief of Staff, who stressed the army's commitment to the Government's security sector reform plan, which he hoped would lead to sustainable peace in the country and later to development. He expressed confidence that the country was on the right path, as evidenced by the increased number of foreigners visiting the country, which showed a restoration of confidence by the international community. The recently conducted army census would shed light on the actual size of the army. General Tagme stressed the need to ensure a dignified reform, as opposed to the previous attempts. The term “dignified reform” was used to refer to providing adequate material and financial benefits to retired or demobilized soldiers, without which soldiers would not go home or demobilize.

42. General Tagme regretted that the army was not in a position to play its role of maintaining peace in the country; over the past 20 years, it had witnessed a slow decline in its professional competence and a lack of proper equipment. The army was not able to contribute to the country’s development, to the country’s protection or to the country’s fight against drug trafficking and other forms of transnational organized crime. He nevertheless reiterated the resolve of the military to continue to be subordinate to civil power and rejected any possibility of intervening in the political arena.

Prime Minister

43. The delegation thanked the Prime Minister for the support that the Government of Guinea-Bissau and he, in particular, had provided to the delegation since its arrival. The members of delegation emphasized that the visit had enabled them to better understand the situation in the country and afforded them an opportunity to engage with the various stakeholders in identifying the challenges confronting the Government and people of Guinea-Bissau. The discussions had also yielded important insights on the priorities for peacebuilding, notably security sector reforms, support for strengthening the institutional capacity of the justice sector, provision of an adequate and reliable supply of energy, public sector reforms and the combating of drug trafficking.

44. It was explained that financial support from “Window one” of the Peacebuilding Fund, which was available to countries on the agenda of the Peacebuilding Commission, would be given in two tranches: the first to be provided for the “quick win” projects that the Government had already submitted; and the second to be provided after the adoption of the strategic framework for peacebuilding with Guinea-Bissau.

45. The members emphasized that the Peacebuilding Commission was committed to supporting the Government’s peacebuilding efforts. The success of those efforts would depend crucially on fostering political stability in the country, enhancing the national ownership of the development process, promoting international partnership in support of national efforts and pursuing an inclusive consultative process that would allow all key stakeholders to participate in the development of an integrated peacebuilding strategy. The delegation explained that such a strategy would govern the engagement between the Government of Guinea-Bissau and the Commission.

46. In his response, the Prime Minister said that the government attached great importance to the visit of the Peacebuilding Commission delegation. He highlighted the country’s peacebuilding priorities, including the promotion of political stability, organizing free and fair elections, combating drug trafficking, undertaking security sector reforms, pursuing public sector reforms and increasing the energy supply. The Government was aware of its dependence on international support and partnership in order to make significant progress in those priorities. The decision to engage with the Peacebuilding Commission reflected the deeply felt need to mobilize international partnerships for Guinea-Bissau's development efforts.

47. The Prime Minister noted that the Government required international support in many areas. He warned that the Government would not be able to finance the forthcoming elections without external financial assistance. He also called attention to the fact that the Government owed three categories of salary arrears: to the staff of the electoral commission; to the military; and to other public sector workers. Paying those arrears would contribute greatly to reducing social and political tensions and to fostering national reconciliation. He stressed that, although the fiscal stabilization programme had considerably improved the fiscal situation, Government revenues had remained insufficient to cover the recurrent public expenditures. In those circumstances, international support was essential and he hoped that engagement with the Peacebuilding Commission would help in that effort.

President

48. The President expressed satisfaction with the visit to Guinea-Bissau of the high-level delegation of the Peacebuilding Commission. He stressed the importance of the delegation's being able to witness first-hand the consequences of the 1998-1999 conflict and the challenges the country was currently facing in rebuilding and sustaining peace. The needs of the country were currently 10 times higher than they had been before the 1998-1999 conflict. Whereas the country used to contribute actively to peacekeeping operations in the past, it was currently reduced to requesting support from the international community even to hold elections.

49. The 2006 Geneva round table had been a disappointment to the country. Many promises had been made, but only a few had come through. There continued to be problems relating to the barracks and territorial border and airspace control. Drug trafficking and illegal migration were additional problems the country had to cope with.

50. The President stressed the importance of the fact that a date had been set for parliamentary elections (16 November). While 21 April constituted the end of the Parliament's mandate, the President said that he would not dissolve the Parliament, which would continue its work in the permanent technical commissions, nor would he dismiss the Government.
