

NARRATIVE

For almost all refugee households in Turkey, the primary source of food remains market purchase. Food insecurity among refugees therefore results, principally, from an inability to access sufficient food, or the right foods, due to their lack of purchasing power. This considered, FSA actors in Turkey have sought to address food insecurity among refugees through e-voucher and other restricted cash programming. In this context, in the past quarter alone, monthly dedicated food assistance was extended to up to 152,000 refugees living in both Temporary Accommodation Centres (TACs) and host communities.

During the reporting period, partners also focused on promoting agricultural livelihoods and by the end of September over 780 refugees and vulnerable members of host communities received trainings in modern agriculture technologies. Alongside the training, in 2018-19, some of the FSA sector partners are also assessing the needs and planning for providing agriculture inputs support; farm-to-market, value chain, and agribusiness support, and environmental protection and preservation measures to create new work and entrepreneurship opportunities in areas hosting large refugee populations.

In the coming quarter, the FSA sector will conduct a survey to identify capacity building needs among sector partners, factoring results into the 2018 sector work plan. Plans are also in place to provide partners with technical assistance to strengthen home-stead, micro-, and kitchen-garden projects.
