Deportation threat

Two Spanish journalists facing deportation after arrest during indigenous protest

28 February 2011

Two Spanish journalists who were arrested during a demonstration by indigenous groups outside the parliament building in Panama City on 26 February – Paco Gómez Nadal and his wife, Pilar Chato – are still being held and are facing the possibility of deportation for allegedly encouraging the indigenous groups to protest against a proposed reform of the mining law.

Reporters Without Borders regards the legal proceedings initiated by the authorities in this case as suspicious and irregular, and calls on the National Directorate for Migration to immediately rescind the order for their detention.

A freelance contributor to the national daily La Prensa and to several foreign newspapers, Gómez is well known for his support for Panama's indigenous population. As a result, he had been threatened in the past with withdrawal of his residence permit, as he told Reporters Without Borders last July.

Following his arrest, President Ricardo Martinelli publicly accused Gómez of being an "agitator" and of "inciting" the protest in violation of the restrictions imposed on foreign residents. The Panamanian authorities claim that this is clear in a video of the demonstration.

"That is false," Gómez's lawyer, Giulia de Santis, told Reporters Without Borders after viewing the video. "On the contrary, it shows police officers warning Paco that they are going to charge the demonstrators. They take him and Pilar away immediately afterwards."

Initially detained in the parliament building, Gómez and Chato were quickly transferred to the headquarters of the National Directorate for Migration, which issued an order for their detention.

“This is against the law, which provides for this kind of measure only when someone is residing in the country illegally, and both Pilar and Paco are legal residents,” De Santis said, adding that it was clear that “there is a political desire to expel them.”

Reporters Without Borders shares this view and regards President Martinelli’s public comments as a violation of the principle of the separation of powers.

The operations of multinational mining corporations and the threat they pose to local communities are a sensitive issue in Central America, one that can create problems for the journalists who specialize in covering it. In El Salvador, community Radio Victoria and its lawyer, Héctor Berrios, were again the targets of serious threats last month.
