INTRODUCTION

0.1 The national legal system

Explain briefly the key aspects of the national legal system that are essential to understanding the legal framework on discrimination. For example, in federal systems, it would be necessary to outline how legal competence for anti-discrimination law is distributed among different levels of government.

The Constitution

In July 2006, the Cypriot Constitution (until then the supreme law of the country) was amended to give supremacy to EU laws. The amendment adds a new article to the Constitution providing that nothing therein stated shall nullify laws, acts or measures rendered necessary as a result of Cyprus' obligations as an EU member state, or to prevent Regulations or Directives or other binding legal measures enacted by the EU or its bodies from having force in Cyprus. This development is significant vis-à-vis the national anti-discrimination legislative framework because, prior to its enactment, the anti-discrimination provision of Article 28 of the Cypriot Constitution was interpreted by the Courts to mean that any positive measures taken in favour of vulnerable groups were violating the Constitution's equality principle.¹

The new amendment renders the positive measure provisions of EU directives superior to the Constitution and thus unchallengeable on the basis of Article 28. In spite of this development, quotas in employment in the public service in favour of persons with disabilities remained at very low levels, against the hopes of the disability movement which had been eagerly awaiting this constitutional reform on the belief that it would lead to substantial institutionalisation of quotas. Meanwhile, decision of the equality body in 2009 has found a law granting priority in employment for blind persons as discriminatory against persons with other forms of disability and asked for its revision, a development which has caused concern amongst the disability movement, who foresee that the results of their struggles over years of activism may all disappear following a rather restrictive interpretation by the equality principle.

¹ See for instance Charalambos Kittis et al v. Republic of Cyprus through the Commission for Public Service (8.12.2006, Appeal No. 56/06). The case is discussed in detail in the Cyprus Country Report of the European Network of Legal Experts in the non-discrimination field (state of affairs up to 08.01.2007) available at http://ec.europa.eu/employment_social/fundamental_rights/pdf/legnet/cyrep07_en.pdf

National Laws ratifying international conventions and transposing EU instruments

Prior to the transposition of the anti-discrimination Directives, the national framework embodying the principle of equal treatment and the combating of discrimination on the basis of racial/ethnic origin, nationality and religious belief, including sexual orientation and age was based on Constitutional, European and International law. These include treaties ratified by the Republic on human rights which cover civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, as well as rights in the field of protection and respect of minorities and migrant workers, such as Protocol 12 to the ECHR which was ratified by Law 13(III) 2002². Domestic legislation also prohibits discrimination in various fields such as education, acquisition of property and employment. The only ground expressly covered by national legislation prior to the transposition of the anti-discrimination acquis was disability, which was addressed by a framework law in 2000, amended in 2004 in order to transpose the relevant provisions of The Employment Equality Directive.

The Additional Protocol on Cybercrime

The entry into force on 01.03.2006 of the law ratifying the Additional Protocol to the Convention on Cyber crime concerning the Criminalisation of Acts of Racist or Xenophobic Nature committed through Computer Systems³ has created new offences in the field of combating discrimination and has for the first time in Cyprus legislated on issues such as the holocaust denial and dissemination of racist material through the internet. There is no case law yet invoking the said law.

The Council Framework Decision 2008/913/JHA

During 2010, preparations came under way for the transposition the Council Framework Decision 2008/913/JHA on combating certain forms and expressions of racism and xenophobia by means of criminal law. Even though the Ministry of Justice had initially expressed to the author⁴ its conviction that the Framework Decision would be transposed into Cypriot legislation within the deadline provided by the said instrument (28.11.2010) by the end of 2010 this had not happened. The reason for the delay was the fact that the Committee on Legal Affairs of the House of Representatives which was reviewing the bill presented by the Ministry of Justice did not accept the bill and asked for its revision.

² This Law entered into force on 1 December 2002.

⁴ Communication with Mrs Kate Andreou, Senior Legal Officer of the Ministry of Justice dated 13.10.2010.

In particular, discussion of the bill at the House Committee's meeting of 07 December 2010 included consultation with stakeholders, two of whom, namely the Head of the Anti-discrimination Authority⁵ and the Head of the Police Anti-discrimination Unit, expressed concerns about the wording of the provision of the bill which purported to transpose Article 4 of the Council Framework Decision. Whilst the Framework Decision provides that measures must ensure that racist and xenophobic motivation is considered an aggravating circumstance or alternatively that it may be taken into consideration by the Courts in the determination of the penalties, the bill presented to the Parliamentary Committee provided that racist and xenophobic motivation may be taken into consideration by the Courts, i.e. it adopted the second option of Article 4 of the Framework Decision. The arguments in favour of the first option, i.e. of creating a binding obligation to consider racist motivation as an aggravating circumstance, were twofold:

- Based on the fact that Cypriot legislation so far did not provide for racist motive to be an aggravating factor, there is no strong judicial tradition in this context upon which further judicial practice may be premised.
- Cypriot legislation already provides that the type and seriousness of the offence may be taken into consideration by the Courts in order to impose a sentence; so far this provision was not utilised by the Courts in imposing a tougher sentence for offences involving a racist motivation. If the intention is to send out a strong message to potential perpetrators that racist motivation will be taken seriously, then the first option must be adopted, as the second option (judicial discretion) provides less of a deterrent. A number of counter-arguments were presented that this may interfere with judicial discretion, which were rejected on the basis that other laws, and in particular the domestic violence law already provides an obligation for the Courts to take into consideration certain aggravating circumstances.

A further concern was raised by the Police, asking that the prosecuting authorities be specifically and expressly entitled to commence self-initiated investigations and prosecutions on matters covered by the Council Framework Decision even in the absence of a complaint from or the consent of the victim or the victim's closest relative where the victim is deceased.⁶

The Parliamentary Committee agreed to address the concerns raised of the Equality Body and the Police and adjourned discussion on the bill, as the House temporarily closed for the Christmas/new year holidays. At the time of writing, the bill was still at the Parliamentary Committee and due to be presented to the Plenary Session for voting as soon as it is revised so as to reflect the above mentioned objections.

A series of racial violence incidents which took place towards the end of 2010 by organized far right groups sparked off a public debate on racism and how this is to be addressed. A number of MPs from centre-right parties have publically positioned themselves against the enactment of any law that will criminalise racist speech although the discussions did not demonstrate any particular awareness on the part of the MPs concerned of the Council Framework Decision. It is not clear how these MPs will react when the bill is presented to the House Plenary for voting, but given that populist politics is the norm in Cyprus, one should not be surprised if these reactions do not transform themselves into a negative vote. During the discussions at the Parliamentary Committee none of the participating MPs positioned themselves against this bill and in fact a consensus in favour of this bill appears to exist amongst MPs.⁷

Ratification of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities

During 2010 the bill that will ratify the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and its Optional Protocol was prepared and discussed. The ratification bill contains a reservation as to article 27(1) of the Convention to the extent that the provisions of this article are incompatible with article 3A of the Law on Persons with Disabilities 2000-2007, which inter alia transposes the disability component of the Employment Equality Directive. The latter provision states that the law does not apply to the armed forces to the extent that the nature of the work requires special skills that persons with disability do not have, and neither does it apply to professional activities where the nature and framework within which they are carried out is such that a characteristic or a skill that a person with a disability lacks constitute a substantial and determining professional requirement, provided the aim is legitimate and the means of achieving that aim are proportionate, taking into consideration the possibility of adopting positive measures.⁸

⁷ Communication from the Ministry of Justice dated 10.01.2011.

⁸ The reservation follows that of the European Union to Article 27(1) of UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities which provides: The European Community states that pursuant to Community law (notably Council Directive 2000/78/EC of 27 November 2000 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation), the Member States may, if appropriate, enter their own reservations to Article 27(1) of the Disabilities Convention to the extent that Article 3(4) of the said Council Directive provides them with the right to exclude non-discrimination on the grounds of disability on the employment in the armed forces from the scope of the Directive. Therefore, the European Union states that it concludes the Convention without prejudice to the above right, conferred on its Member States by virtue of Community law.

The “doctrine of necessity”

Following the adoption of legislation to transpose the directives, a crucial concern is the possibility of direct discrimination against Turkish-Cypriots on the ground of ethnic origin as well as indirect discrimination on the ground of religion⁹ on the basis of a legal norm developed by the Cypriot Courts in the 1960s known as the ‘doctrine of necessity’¹⁰ which effectively suspends the communal rights which the Constitution had granted to the Turkish Cypriot community.¹¹ Two key manifestations of the problems resulting from this doctrine is the lack of access of Turkish Cypriots to their properties located in the area within the control of the Republic and the fact that there are hardly any translations in Turkish language to enable Turkish-Cypriots to have access to public services, jobs, opportunities and pursuing their rights. Until 2006 Turkish Cypriots were also denied the right to vote, based on the doctrine of necessity; however the Republic was forced to change this law¹² following the ECHR ruling in the case of Aziz v. The Republic of Cyprus,¹³ granting the individual right to Turkish-Cypriots residing in the south to vote and to stand for election as part of the same electoral roll as the Greek Cypriots; as a result, in the Parliamentary Elections of 21.05.2006, Turkish Cypriots voted for the first time since 1964. The enactment of the new anti-discrimination legislation in May 2004, combined with the partial lifting in the restrictions on movement in April 2003, as a result of which thousands of Turkish-Cypriots are working, seeking employment and access to public services in the south, has resulted in a totally novel situation, which opens up the possibility for on-going discrimination.

The reason often offered for the non-use of the Turkish language since 1963 is the doctrine of necessity; however, the legality of suspending Constitutional provisions on the basis of a Supreme Court judgement is questionable.

¹³ ECHR/ no. 69949/01 (22.06.2004), reported at <http://www.echr.coe.int/Eng/Press/2004/June/ChamberJudgmentAzizvCyprus220604.htm>. The case is discussed in the Cyprus Country Report of the European Network of Legal Experts in the non-discrimination field (state of affairs up to 08.01.2007) available at http://ec.europa.eu/employment_social/fundamental_rights/pdf/legnet/cyrep07_en.pdf. The decision of the ECtHR in the case of Aziz, that the ‘doctrine of necessity’ must be exercised in a manner that does not violate the nucleus of rights or the principle of equality, was not consistently followed either by the Courts in Cyprus or by the equality body, as both have issued decisions upholding the ‘doctrine of necessity’ as legal justification for the suspension of the constitutional rights of the Turkish Cypriots.

An Equality body decision pursuant to a complaint regarding the non-use of the Turkish language in the official Gazette, recognised that discrimination against Turkish-Cypriots¹⁴ does seem to exist at the level of access to public services but concluded that it cannot interfere on the issue of the Turkish publication of the Gazette, invoking the “doctrine of necessity”.¹⁵ In another case the Supreme Court, in an interim decision, allowed the Turkish-Cypriot litigants to submit their pleadings in Turkish as provided in the Constitution, rejecting the Attorney General’s arguments that Turkish Cypriots should not be allowed to do so.¹⁶ The Third Opinion on Cyprus of the Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, adopted on 19.03.010¹⁷ and released on 09.10.2010, following the submission of the comments from the Cypriot government on the previous day¹⁸ extensively refers to the continuing non-solution of the Cyprus problem as negatively impacting not only the climate of dialogue and understanding, but also state policy related to minority protection and human rights. The Advisory Committee’s report further states that shortcomings continue to be reported regarding the effective participation of Turkish Cypriots in social, economic and cultural life and public affairs and that intercultural dialogue remains problematic. The governmental response went into great lengths to stress that the Turkish Cypriots are not a minority and are thus not covered by the Framework Convention. Nevertheless, the government report states that “Turkish Cypriot citizens enjoy specifically designed or privileged access to all Government services, irrespective of their area of residence...[involving] priority access e.g. to public medical services (including treatment abroad) or to services dealing with welfare or regarding their civic status.”¹⁹

0.2 Overview/State of implementation

List below the points where national law is in breach of the Directives. This paragraph should provide a concise summary, which may take the form of a bullet point list. Further explanation of the reasons supporting your analysis can be provided later in the report.

This section is also an opportunity to raise any important considerations regarding the implementation and enforcement of the Directives that have not been mentioned elsewhere in the report.

This could also be used to give an overview on the way (if at all) national law has given rise to complaints or changes, including possibly a reference to the number of complaints, whether instances of indirect discrimination have been found by judges, and if so, for which grounds, etc.

Please bear in mind that this report is focused on issues closely related to the implementation of the Directives. General information on discrimination in the domestic society (such as immigration law issues) are not appropriate for inclusion in this report.

Please ensure that you review the existing text and remove items where national law has changed and is no longer in breach.

Cyprus has enacted four laws which entered into force on the date of its accession to the EU (01.05.2005): the law amending the existing disability law,²⁰ the law transposing (roughly) the employment directive,²¹ the law transposing (roughly) the race directive²² and the law appointing the Ombudsman as the specialised body (hereinafter “the equality body”) empowered to investigate complaints of discrimination under all three of the aforesaid laws and beyond.²³ The national laws enacted for the purpose of transposing the two Directives are more or less in compliance with the said Directives. However the following issues emerge as problematic:

Revising discriminatory laws

The duty to ensure that discriminatory laws and provision have been explicitly repealed²⁴ by way of a general provision in the two main anti-discrimination laws²⁵ has not been fully complied with. No review of the existing laws was made to ensure compliance with the Directives. Practice suggests that the process of formal repeal of older laws which do not comply with the Directives is somehow ‘triggered off’ only after a complaint is submitted to the equality body.

²³ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law N. 42(1)/2004 (19.03.2004).

²⁴ As required by the Employment Equality Directive, Article 16 and the Racial Equality Directive, Article 14.

²⁵ Article 16(1) The Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation Law No. 58 (1)/2004 (31.3.2004) and Article 10(1) The Equal Treatment (Racial or Ethnic Origin) Law No. 59(I) /2004 (31.3.2004).

There is no procedure for continuous reviewing of existing legislation for the purpose of assessing compatibility with the anti-discrimination directives. The equality body has the right to refer laws, regulations and practices containing discriminatory provisions to the Attorney General, who has an obligation to advise the competent Minister or the Council of Ministers of measures to be taken and prepare the corresponding law.²⁶ However, not all the recommendations of the equality body were taken up by the Attorney General, as a result of which the discriminatory law/ regulation/ practice remains in force (until expressly repealed by law) in contravention of article 16 of the Employment Equality Directive and of article 14 of the Racial Equality Directive.

As a manifestation of this problem, article 4 of the Termination of Employment Law which entitles employers to dismiss employees over 65 years of age without compensation, was found by the equality body to amount to discrimination on the ground of age, in violation of article 8(1) of the Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation Law N.58(I)/2004, transposing the Employment Equality Directive (reported under section 3.0 of this report). Although the law was referred to the Attorney General for revision, no new law has emerged repealing the discriminatory provision, which continues to remain in force. Also, several regulations requiring job applicants to have “excellent knowledge of Greek” continue to remain in force, in spite of equality body recommendations that they should be revised.

In its annual report for the years 2007-2008, the equality authority (one of the two bodies comprising the equality body, which deals with matters in the employment field) expressed concern over the ineffective operation of article 39 of the Combating of Racial and Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law, which sets the procedure for revising discriminatory provisions in laws and regulations. The report notes that very often its proposals are viewed with suspicion by the executive and do not lead to any correction of the law. It nevertheless notes with satisfaction a number of instances where its proposals for amendments in the law were adopted, such as the extension of the law so that the profession of the estate agent may be carried out by EU nationals, the extension of the sectors of the economy where asylum seekers may be employed; the removal of the Greek language requirement from the job specifications of nursing and medical practitioners; the revision of the conditions for granting state benefit to persons with severe disability so that the entitlement to the benefit no longer depends on origin of the disability. Meanwhile, a significant body of case law is beginning to emerge, where applicants seek to challenge the legality and validity of laws containing discriminatory provisions but the Courts’ response is that they have no power to change the law, only to interpret it.

²⁶ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law N. 42(1)/2004, articles 39(1) and 39(3) respectively.

Dialogue with civil society / awareness raising

Certain provisions of the two Directives which require the Member States to take measures other than the enactment of legislation such as the promotion of dialogue with social partners and NGOs²⁷ and the obligation to bring all anti-discrimination provisions to the attention of the persons concerned²⁸ have not been fully implemented. In recent years, apart from an EU funded campaign carried out by the equality body, there have been no awareness raising initiatives with regard to non-discrimination.

Jurisdiction of the labour tribunal

A labour tribunal decision ruled in 2008 that it has no jurisdiction to adjudicate on the complaint of a job candidate whose application had been turned down because of her age.²⁹ However, Law on Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation N.58(I)/2004 which transposes The Employment Equality Directive (minus the disability component, which is transposed by another law) as well as the employment component of The Racial Equality Directive, expressly provides that the competent court to adjudicate on matters arising under the law is the labour tribunal. The scope of the law includes conditions of access to employment including selection criteria, in compliance with article 3 of the Employment Equality Directive. Following the legal gap created as a result of this decision, the Cypriot Law on Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation N.58(I)/2004 was amended by Law 86(I)/2009 to the effect that all disputes arising under the said law, whether concerning access to employment or self-employment or training or membership in trade unions shall, for the purposes of this law, be deemed to be labour disputes. The legal gap still remains with regard to the ground of disability however, which is covered by another law (N.127(I)/2000 as amended) that has not been updated. As a result, disputes arising under the disability law in cases where no employment relationship exists do not have a competent court to try them.

²⁷ The Employment Equality Directive, Paragraph 33 of the Preamble; Articles 13 and 14. Also, the Racial Equality Directive Preamble paragraph 23. During the drafting of the various National Action Plans, the trade unions were consulted but were not informed as to which of their proposals were accepted or not, nor were any reasons given; they saw the final National Action Plans published. The only NGO dealing with racism and racial exclusions at the time (KISA) was not consulted in the formation of National Action Plans (for Employment, Social Inclusion, Education).

Positive measures and quotas v. the equality principle

A new law came into force towards the end of 2009 introducing quotas in the employment of persons with disabilities in the wider public sector at 10 per cent of the number of the vacancies to be filled in at any given time, provided that this does not exceed seven per cent of the aggregate of employees per department. The law contains a number of provisions which the disability movement (via its confederation 'KYSOA') had strongly opposed during the consultation process. KYSOA' objections may be summarised as follows:³⁰

1. The definition of the term "person with a disability" in the law is wide enough to cover persons with chronic diseases. Although the confederation has no objection to the category of the chronically ill persons benefiting from quotas or other perks, it believes that they should not be granted benefits at the expenses of persons with disabilities.
2. The law excludes from the scope of the quota, job positions high up in the hierarchy, as implied by the wording used to define the term "employment position." As such it amounts to unlawful discrimination against persons with disability, as well as to a limitation of the scope of Law 58(I)/2004 on Equal Treatment in Employment implementation (transposing the employment component of the two anti-discrimination Directive) which excludes from the scope of the law only the army and the security forces, as per the provisions of the Directive.³¹
3. Persons with disability should not be required to take exams in order to be admitted to the public service because during the exam they will invariably be at a disadvantageous position compared with other candidates without a disability. All candidates for positions at the public service are obliged to take an exam and the new law introducing the quota did not exempt people with disabilities from this obligation. The confederation contends that exams should be introduced for persons with disability only where there are more than one applicant with a disability for the same post(s).
4. The quota of 10 per cent foreseen in the law is far too low. The confederation suggests that the relevant provision is rephrased to the effect that, where the annual number of vacant posts to be filled in cannot possibly be met by the 10 per cent quota, then the aggregate number of posts becoming vacant during the last four years should be taken into account instead. In other words, when there are more vacancies than what the 10% of disability candidates can fill in, then the quota of 10% should be calculated not only on the posts becoming vacant at any particular instance, but on the aggregate number of posts which have become vacant in the last four years.

³¹ The decision not to extend the quotas to more senior positions may not amount to discrimination under Law 58(I) transposing the Employment Equality Directive, given that there is no obligation in law to introduce quotas. However, the said provision does raise a rebuttable presumption that the legislator may have considered persons with disability as unfit to take up more senior posts.

5. The special multi-disciplinary committee foreseen by the law in order to evaluate the suitability of job candidates with disability does not include in its ranks a representative of the confederation of the disability organisations. Moreover, the said committee does not have a specific obligation to call on experts on the particular disability of any given job candidate to express their view.
6. The confederation believes that the best way of ensuring the institutionalisation of the quota system is to amend Article 28 of the Cypriot Constitution, which establishes the equality principle. Otherwise, any law providing for quotas may at any time be declared by the Courts as unconstitutional.
7. The confederation reserves the right to claim for quotas in the private sector as well.
8. Quotas should be introduced not only to the hiring procedure but also to the procedure for promotions, in accordance with the European Convention for the vocational rehabilitation of persons with disability.

The law appears to lack a mechanism for enforcement, as disability organisations record cases where public service departments ignore the law and the Ministry of Labour is unable to do anything. In one particular case where the Statistical Service of the Republic refused to hire a blind person in violation of the new law, the Minister of Labour responded to that person's complaint by stating that it lacks competency to interfere with the correctness of the decision. One senior officer at the Statistical Service was quoted as saying that the new law is unconstitutional (for violating article 28 of the Constitution) and therefore his department is under no obligation to apply it.

An equality body decision in 2009 has raised again the issue of the compatibility of positive action measures with the equality principle. The decision found that a law introducing quotas in employment for blind telephonists discriminates against persons with other disabilities and has asked for its revision.

Devoting resources to the equality body

The Third Opinion on Cyprus of the Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities issued in 2010 states that in view of the growing number of discrimination complaints, awareness-raising efforts should be intensified and the institutional framework for combating discrimination needs to be strengthened, whilst the competent authorities must be provided with more adequate resources.

Since its inception in 2004, the equality body has been greatly understaffed and under funded by the government,³² which partly accounts for the fact that it has not made full use of the powers granted to it by the law, such as the power to draft codes of conduct intended to combat discrimination on the grounds provided by the Directives. Thus, the equality body has not utilised the opportunity to issue a code of conduct on discrimination against homosexuals at the workplace, when an opinion survey it has commissioned in 2006 demonstrated extensive homophobia in Cypriot society.³³ During 2008 the mandate of the equality authority (one of the two bodies comprising the equality body) was extended by a new gender discrimination law.³⁴ This has resulted in a shift in emphasis in favour of gender discrimination, manifested by the fact that in 2008 55 per cent of the complaints submitted to this body concerned gender discrimination. The same pattern continued in 2009 and 2010 where 50 per cent of the complaints concerned gender discrimination. This extension of mandate was not accompanied by an increase in the members of staff and the report describes itself as “understaffed”.³⁵ Under the new state of affairs, it is inevitable that the other grounds of discrimination will be given less attention than before.

Addressing racial violence

The partial lifting of the ban on the freedom of movement between north and south in 2003 has led to several instances of discrimination and violence against Turkish-Cypriots by far right groups³⁶ none of which have led not to convictions on offences involving racist motive. The treatment of these incidents by the authorities demonstrates an attempt to downplay the racist motive as well as the significance of the incidents.

³² In his 2006 report (dated 29.03.2006), the Commissioner for Human Rights of the Council of Europe Mr. Alvaro Gil-Robles expresses his regret for the fact that the necessary increase in funding to deal with the extra work-load has not been provided to the Ombudsman and recommends that greater resources be devoted to this office to enable it to deal effectively with its new competencies. Similarly, in its third report on Cyprus dated 16.05.2006, ECRI also stresses the need for resources to be made available to the Ombudsman to enable her to respond to her tasks.

The same pattern is followed as regards racist violence against third country nationals where again the police appears reluctant to prosecute and to record racist crime, the stakeholders involved refuse to acknowledge the racist nature of the incident and the Courts fail to deliver guilty verdicts. The result is that perpetrators go unpunished, the problem is not otherwise addressed and the phenomenon reproduces itself.³⁷

During 2010 there was an upsurge of racist violence against migrants who are consistently scapegoated by populist politicians and right wing media outlets as responsible for unemployment, as receiving higher state benefits than Cypriots and so on. There has been significant media coverage of far right groups, previously marginal but gradually being upgraded into mainstream politics, who have been supported by populist politicians from all right wing parties including the Archbishop himself, campaigning against the presence of migrants in Cyprus and against state policy which is depicted as favouring migrants over Cypriots in terms of jobs and state subsidies. The result of these debates has been a rise in violent incidents from members of the far right groups against migrants and Turkish Cypriots. The culmination of the tension was a full blown riot on 05.11.2010 when members of far right organisations led by a right wing MP forcibly entered an anti-racist festival and beat up several of the participants including migrant women and their children, vandalised the equipment and stabbed a Turkish Cypriot musician. Ironically, the only persons arrested were half a dozen anti-racists who were charged with breach of the peace. The anti-racist festival was carried out by a national NGO (KISA) and was funded by the Ministry of Interior and supported by the representation of the European Commission in Cyprus. At the time when the far right group entered the festival venue, the Head of the EU Representation in Cyprus was speaking through the microphone. On the day following the event, she herself stated that the media coverage of the event was so distorted that had she not attended the event herself she would not have a clear picture of what happened. This event was preceded and followed by several other instances of racial violence, including an organised attack by 500 basketball 'fans' against the players of a Turkish basketball team that was hosted in Cyprus on 21.12.2010 in order to play a game with a Greek Cypriot team. The reaction of politicians and state officials was that this was a brainless act that gave ammunition to Turkey to accuse the Cypriots. No reference was made to racism and to the upsurge of racist violence. The police arrested only three minors in relation to this event.

³⁷ In 2005 a member of Chryssi Avgi was tried for having attacked Turkish Cypriots on two different incidents. He was acquitted by the court on the ground that the prosecution failed to prove its case beyond reasonable doubt and that any actions of the accused were self-defence [Kalatzis, M. (2005) "Athoohike o Chyravgitis" in Politis, (05.11.2005), p.47]. Since then, attacks against Turkish Cypriot by members of ultra nationalist groups have multiplied, but there are hardly any prosecutions and even fewer convictions. The most well known of these incidents was the violent attack against Turkish Cypriot pupils at Nicosia's 'English School' in 2006 by a group of hooded youth. The Attorney General brought charges against the perpetrators of this attack but none of these related to offences involving a racist motive. The sentences imposed by the court were a mere imposition of a few hours of community work.

Making use of the judicial system

Court decisions in the field of discrimination have demonstrated a tendency on the part of judges to interpret the law quite restrictively. As a result, certain issues which are a matter of interpretation, such as whether association with persons carrying certain characteristics is a prohibited ground for discrimination or not are left to the judge's discretion. Although the Cypriot Courts are bound under EU law to follow the CJEU's reasoning in the interpretation of the equality provisions of national legislation, it is possible that individual judges will nevertheless continue to interpret the law restrictively, unless and until specifically and directly challenged by the CJEU. Reading through Court decisions in the field of equality, one gets the impression that both judges and lawyers are unaware of the EU anti discrimination acquis. There are very few references to the laws transposing the two anti-discrimination Directives and even in those cases, there appear to be clear-cut misunderstandings of the law.

Developments are slower in the field of sexual orientation than in other grounds, as LGBTs are mostly closeted and are therefore reluctant to use the justice system in order to pursue their rights. In spite of the institutionalisation of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground for discrimination, and despite decriminalisation in the 1990s, homosexuality continues to be a taboo and gay people themselves find it hard to come forward and claim their rights, for fear of social contempt. In April 2010 tensions amongst anti-gay activists rose high when the equality body issued a report in response to two complaints on the lack of any legal framework for same sex couples to formalise their relationships.³⁸ The report recommended the introduction of a framework so as to legally recognise the cohabitation of homosexual couples as a realistic policy response to an existing social need. It adds that in the case of homosexual couples the legal gap in the recognition of cohabitations inevitably leads to inequality that may not be convincingly justified. The report caused a lively debate in the media, with several persons positioning themselves against the recognition of same sex relationships. The most notable of these was the interview with right wing MP Themistocleous who spoke live on national radio on 13.04.2010 expressing his disagreement over the recognition of same sex couples. In response to the Ombudsman's statement that homosexual couples are a fact of life, the MP stated on air that murders, bestiality and paedophilia are also a fact of life but they are not legally recognised.³⁹ Shortly after the publication of the equality body report, a new NGO emerged named 'Accept'⁴⁰ calling for the equal treatment of LGBT persons, and promoting the legal recognition of homosexual marriages.

This is the first instance of LGBT persons coming out of the closet, after the well known gay rights activist Alec Modinos who won the ECHR case against Cyprus,⁴¹ so the landscape as regards legal pursuit of gay rights may be about to change.

Lack of awareness amongst vulnerable groups and amongst legal circles has led to the paradox that since the directives were transposed in 2004 only one case was taken to Court invoking discrimination on any of the five grounds provided by the anti-discrimination directives.⁴² In addition to that, reference to the anti-discrimination directives was made in Court in passing, in two more instances.⁴³

It is interesting to note, however that some of the decisions of the equality body in the last two years examine issues of discrimination on one or more of the five grounds beyond employment, in the fields covered by the Racial Equality Directive, in anticipation to and within the spirit of the decision of the European Commission to introduce a Directive addressing discrimination on all five grounds beyond the employment field.

⁴¹ Judgement 22.04.1993, 16 EHRR 485 available at http://ius.info/EUII/EUCHR/dokumenti/1993/04/CASE_OF_MODINOS_v_CYPRUS_22_04_1993.html. In this case, the ECHR ruled that the criminalisation of homosexuality, under the antiquated Cyprus Criminal code dating back to 1885, was a violation of Article 8 of the European Convention of Human Rights.

⁴² Avgoustina Hajiavraam v. The Cooperative Credit Company of Morphou, 30.07.2008, Case No. 258/05, reported under section 3.6.2 below.

⁴³ One decision concerned the applicant's request for referral to the ECJ of the question whether article 2 of the Racial Equality Directive could be interpreted in a manner permitting an EU member state to deny the lawful owner of a property the right to sell it; the request was rejected on technical grounds. However the judge in this case ruled that access to property was outside the scope of the Racial Equality Directive (Perihan Mustafa Korkut or Eyiam Perihan v. Apostolos Georgiou through his attorney Charalambos Zoppos. Discussed in more detail below, in section 3.6.1 of this Report). The other decision concerned a claim for unlawful discrimination on the ground of age contained in a law setting out pensionable ages. The applicants did not seek to have the law declared unconstitutional but merely to sever from it the discriminatory provisos. The Court decided that it did not have the power to do, as changes in the legislation could only be carried out by the legislative branch of the state (Vasos Constantinou v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Public Service Commission; Androula Stavrou v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Public Service Commission. Discussed in more detail below in section 0.3 of this Report.)

→ Please use this section not only to update, complete or develop last year's report, but also to include information on important and relevant case law concerning the equality grounds of the two Directives (also beyond employment on the grounds of The Employment Equality Directive), even if it does not relate to the legislation transposing them - e.g. if it concerns previous legislation unrelated to the transposition of the Directives

Please describe trends and patterns in cases brought by Roma and Travellers, and provide figures – if available.

Very few cases invoking the laws transposing the anti-discrimination acquis in general have been taken to Court. This is partly a reflection of the lack of awareness of both victims and lawyers regarding the new procedures and rights created with the transposition of the anti-discrimination acquis⁴⁴ as well as the high cost⁴⁵ and length of time required for litigation render the Courts a less attractive channel for pursuing a complaint.

As a measure, litigation is in practice not available to the large majority of the vulnerable groups in Cyprus due to the cost and length of time involved,⁴⁶ least of all to the Roma who are perhaps more marginalised than any other vulnerable group. Information about the new rights and procedures created by the set of laws which came into effect in 2004 transposing the two anti-discrimination Directives has not been disseminated sufficiently in order to encourage at least some recourse to the specialised body by the Roma. Nothing was printed in Turkish, the language spoken by the Roma, with the exception of a short leaflet issued by the Equality body, which however was not disseminated to the Roma settlements.

Similarly, there have been no cases ever brought by (or on behalf of)⁴⁷ Roma to the Equality body or the Ombudsman alleging discrimination or indeed raising any other issue concerning the Roma.

⁴⁴ The Third ECRI report on Cyprus states that awareness of the legal framework against discrimination among the legal community and the general public is still very limited and calls on the Cypriot authorities to take steps to improve awareness of the provisions against racial discrimination among the legal community and the public: ECRI (2006), Third Report on Cyprus, Strasbourg 16.05.2006, pp. 7-8.

On the contrary, the Ombudsman, who acts as Cyprus' specialised body, has received a complaint from residents of an area close to the Roma settlement in Limassol against the authorities for allegedly ignoring the residents' request to relocate the Roma settlement, complaining about the Roma lifestyle with overtly racist language. In response, the Ombudsman's report found the complainant's allegations, of higher crime rates in the area owing to the presence of the Roma, as unfounded, indicating that the police records did not support this allegation. The Ombudsman went a step further and stressed the rights of the Roma community; condemned the authorities for lacking the political will to solve their problems and for yielding to the unreasonable reactions of the local communities; and recommended a set of measures for their social integration.⁴⁸

In 2003 the Ombudsman conducted a self-initiated survey into the housing conditions of the Roma and produced a comprehensive report deploring the unacceptable squalor and poverty of the Roma housing. Also, in 2005 the Ombudsman (in her capacity as Equality body) conducted a self-initiated investigation into an incident whereby the parents' association of a school in Paphos arbitrarily closed down the school between 22.09.2005 and 26.09.2005 demanding from the Education Ministry to suspend attendance to the school of Roma pupils until they receive confirmation that none of them suffers from Hepatitis, following some Hepatitis incidents in a nearby village three months earlier. Although the closure of the school constituted a criminal offence, no action was taken against the parents.

In addition to the lack of awareness of the Roma as regards the channels to complain, the phenomenon of underreporting appears to be prevalent within the Roma community. Whilst the Third ECRI report mentions that "[h]ostility and rejection by the local non-Roma population [towards the Roma] is reported to be high and to have in some cases resulted in physical violence", no single complaint was ever filed, whilst the authorities tend to play down the racist dimension of the incidents reported in the press.⁴⁹ In July 2004, a Greek-Cypriot man killed a ten year old Roma boy in an unprovoked cold blooded incident which took place in a public area in Limassol. Even before the conclusion of the inquest, the Cypriot government and all political parties rushed to condemn the incident as an isolated crime committed by a psychopath with a criminal record who was also a drug addict, obviously fearing retaliations and further violence from members of the Turkish Cypriot community. In a press release after the incident, a human rights NGO⁵⁰ regretted the interpretation offered by the authorities arguing that psychopathologic conditions or drug abuse do not automatically turn a person into a murderer, nor do they justify the apparent nationalist and racist motives of the murderer.

⁴⁸ Cyprus Ombudsman's Report on the Gypsies of the Turkish-Cypriot quarter of Limassol, File No. A/P 839/2003, 10.12.2003.

⁵⁰ KISA Press release 16.07.2004.

The Third Opinion on Cyprus of the Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, adopted on 19.03.2010, greets the extension of the protection provided by the Framework Convention to the Cypriot Roma⁵¹ as a positive development. The extension of the Framework Convention to cover the Roma is a deviation from previous policy, which did not recognise the Roma as a separate community. The Advisory Committee's report states however that despite a few support measures offered, the Roma still face serious prejudice and difficulties in many fields including education, whilst the establishment of a dialogue between the government and the Roma remains problematic. The Advisory Committee urged the government to identify ways to establish a structured dialogue with the Roma and to obtain up-to-date information regarding their ethnic, linguistic and religious affiliation.

Generally speaking, in spite of the scarcity of court decisions in the area of anti-discrimination, since the enactment of the anti-discrimination laws in May 2004, there have been several complaints of discrimination filed with the equality body, although there is a certain confusion between the functions and competences of this body as ombudsman and as equality body and a large section of the public are not aware of the difference, as a result of which they file their complaints to the ombudsman rather than the equality body. A manifestation of this is the fact that whilst there is an abundance of complaints and decisions against state organs, there are very few complaints against companies or individuals in the private sector, reflecting the fact that the new competencies of the ombudsman as equality body with wide powers examining complaints in both the public and the private sector are not widely known to the public. This however is likely to change in 2011 as the new ombudsman and head of the equality body takes over from the previous one, who had served for two consecutive terms, a total of 12 years, and had placed considerably more weight on the institution of the ombudsman rather than that of the equality body.

Court decisions in 2010

Athlete with a disability claims discrimination in a scheme of awards (I)

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Date of decision: 10 February 2010

Name of the parties: Antonis Aresti v. Cyprus Athletics Organisation

Reference number: 1406/2008

Brief summary: The applicant was an athlete with a disability who was participating in the Paralympics Games. He applied to the Court seeking to annul a decision of the Cyprus Athletics Organisation (KOA) by which a scheme of awards for high athletic achievement in both the Olympics and the Paralympics was adopted.

⁵¹ Third Periodic Report submitted by Cyprus pursuant to Article 05, paragraph 1 of the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, received on 30.04.2009, page 23.

The applicant argued that the scheme introduced unequal treatment between athletes participating in the Olympics and those participating in the Paralympics, as it provides for much higher amounts to be paid to the Olympics athletes, as opposed to the Paralympics athletes. The Court found that the applicant lacked a legitimate interest and that his interest would crystallize only if and when he did participate in the Paralympics and did reach a level of achievement that would entitle him to payment under the scheme complained of. The Court went on to say that article 28 of the Constitution upon which the essence of discrimination is premised, does not prohibit discrimination resulting from or coexisting with the objective substance of things. Given that the Olympics athletes are in good health and the Paralympics athletes have a disability, the differential treatment in the provisions is justified, because the demands of the Olympics are much higher than those of the Paralympics and the Olympics are much harder to win. In view of this, the Court concluded, the scheme cannot be deemed as introducing discrimination, since it deals with the different things which can only be dealt with differently.

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Name of the parties: Cyprus Athletics Organisation v. Andreas Potamitis

Reference number: 111/2007

Brief summary: The applicant was an athlete with a disability who participated in the Athens Paralympics of 2004 and won the seventh position in swimming. He was awarded by the Cyprus Athletics Organisation the sum of CYP12,000 (€20,505) out of the scheme of awards to Paralympics athletes. The applicant refused to receive this amount, claiming that he was entitled to CYP60,000 (€102,529) which would have been his award had he achieved the same success in the Olympic Games. He applied to the Court seeking to annul the decision of the Cyprus Athletics Organisation and to challenge the legality of differential treatment of the Paralympics athletes under the Awards Scheme, which provides for payment to Paralympics athletes amounting to 1/5 of the amount payable to the Olympics athletes. Although the application was deemed well founded by the trial Court which found there was discrimination against athletes with a disability, the appeal Court subsequently reversed this judgment and confirmed the legitimacy of the decision of the Cyprus Athletics Organisation. The appeal Court found that the trial Court had erroneously tried to compare two unequal things whilst the constitutional principle of equality found in article 28 of the Constitution requires equal treatment of equal situations.

Both the above decisions essentially accept the discriminatory treatment of athletes with disability on the basis that athletes with disability are not similar and thus cannot be compared with athletes without disability. This is a rather problematic concept that negates the essence of the anti-discrimination principle established by the two Council Directives.

Turkish Cypriot is denied student grant

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Date of decision: 17 December 2010

Name of the parties: Tomris Orses and Turgay Volkan Orses v The Ministry of Finance

Reference number: 2408/2006

Brief summary: The applicant was a Turkish Cypriot residing in the Turkish controlled north of Cyprus and was studying at a music academy in the areas controlled by the Republic of Cyprus. He appealed against the decision of the Ministry of Finance which declined his application for a student grant on the basis of a law (N.77(I)/1996) which restricts state provisions to persons having their regular residence in the areas controlled by the Republic. The applicant argued that the rejection of his application was contrary to article 28 of the Constitution; that the law on which the Ministry's decision was based is unconstitutional as it introduces unlawful discrimination against a certain group of citizens, in this case the Turkish Cypriots; and asked that the legislative provision restricting entitlement to the grant only to those residing in the areas under the control of the Republic be deleted. The applicant further argued that the Ministry's decision was contrary to Protocol 12 of the ECHR. The Court found that the legislative provisions had been correctly applied and that the Court does not have the power to alter or correct such provisions. The Court further found that a decision declaring the said law unconstitutional would not lead to an acceptance of the applicant's claim and thus the Court refrained from declaring the said law unconstitutional.

Applicant claims that the extension of retirement age introduces discrimination

Name of the parties: Eleni Kyriakidou v Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation

Reference number: 18/2008

Brief summary: The defendant in this case, the semi-governmental radio and TV channel CyBC extended the retirement age from 60 to 62 for those employees who reach retirement age from 1.7.2008 onwards. The applicant was an employee of the defendant who reached retirement age on 28.3.2007 and was thus not allowed to benefit from the extension of the new retirement regulation. She thus applied to the Court under article 146 of the Constitution to have this decision of her employer set aside. The trial court found that if this new retirement regulation was found unconstitutional on the ground of discrimination, then it will be declared invalid and the applicant will again not be able to benefit from it, citing for this the case of Vasos Constantinou et al v. the Republic (2007). The applicant appealed against the trial court decision arguing that her case differed from Vasos Constantinou et al in that the new regulation for the extension of the retirement age came in force while she was still in service. The appeal court rejected this argument on the ground that her claim could only be satisfied if the new regulation extending the retirement age was annulled.

For that to happen, the legitimacy and/or the constitutionality of this regulation would have to be challenged, which raises two problems: first the applicant does not have a legitimate interest since there was no positive legislative provision entitling her to claim this right and secondly the process of annulment would not benefit the applicant as it would have the effect of cancelling the new regulation. No mention was made of the law transposing the Employment Equality Directive.

Extension of retirement age for public education teachers

Date of decision: 12 March 2010

Name of the parties: Adonis Stylianou et al v. the Republic of Cyprus through the Council of Ministers and the Ministry of Education

Reference number: 2169/2006

Brief summary: A number of public school teachers applied to the Court seeking to set aside a decision of the government not to extend their retirement age for public schools teachers as it did for all other civil servants. The application invoked inter alia the law transposing the Employment Equality Directive (Law N.58(I)/2004) as prohibiting discrimination on the ground of age. The Court found that this law does not create an obligation on the government to fix the same retirement age for all categories of civil servants and that the law expressly excludes the fixing of the retirement age from its scope, leaving it to the national governments to determine. The Court added that, in any case, it has no power to change the retirement age law in order to extend it to the teachers.

Extension of retirement age for police sergeants

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Date of decision: 08 October 2010

Name of the parties: Nicos Elia v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Chief of Police

Reference number: 1718/2008

Brief summary: The applicant was a police sergeant who was forced by law (article 12(1) of N.97(I)1997) to retire at 55. He applied to the Court to set aside the decision of the Chief of Police asking him to retire at 55 and also sought to have the law, forcing him and other police sergeant to retire at 55, annulled as contrary to the law transposing The Employment Equality Directive. He sought the right to retire at 60 as all other civil servants. In order to do so, however, a change in the legislation would be required, in order to cancel the obligatory retirement of police sergeants at 55. Citing extensively the decision in the case of Constantinou v. The Republic (2007) the Court found that it has no power to amend any legislation or create a new one.

The above cases demonstrate the problems in implementation of the compliance provision found in both Directives (article 16 of The Employment Equality Directive and article 14 of The Racial Equality Directive). Although the national law provides a mechanism for the revision of discriminatory laws and regulations, it is apparent that the system is lacking both in its conception as well as in its application.

Court interprets article 28 of the Constitution

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Date of decision: 15 March 2009

Name of the parties: Anna Loizidou v. The Republic

Reference number: 991/2007

Brief summary: The applicant filed a recourse seeking to set aside a decision of the Educational Service Committee by which she was not included in the list of teachers specialised in children with special needs, to be appointed in elementary schools. The respondent's argument was that the applicant did not meet the necessary qualifications to be included. The applicant's argument was that other people with exactly the same qualifications as herself had been included in the list and had even got appointed as teachers in public schools. Relying on article 28 of the Constitution, the applicant claimed, inter alia, that the principle of equality was violated, but without specifying ground for discrimination. In response to this argument, the Court found that article 28 does not confer the right to absolute and precise mathematical equality but offers protection only against arbitrary discrimination. The Court went on to add that reasonable discrimination is allowed where the nature of things is such; and that article 28 is breached only when differential treatment is not based on an objective and reasonable discrimination.

The decision establishes a rather wide exception to the prohibition of discrimination which is doubtful whether it meets the requirements of Employment Equality Directive.

Court rules on Turkish Cypriot's claim of discrimination in his employer's decision not to take him back to work after the Turkish invasion of 1974

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus (in its appellate jurisdiction)

Name of the parties: Fadil Izzet v. Cyprus Oil Storage Company

Reference number: 219/2006

Brief summary: The appellant was an employee of the respondent company who was forced to abandon his place of work in 1974 following the Turkish invasion. He subsequently contacted the respondent asking them to take him back to work, adding that he could settle in the bi-communal village of Pyla and obtain the necessary permits from the Turkish Cypriot administration in order to come to work in the south. The applicant claimed that the respondent company's failure to take him back to work was in breach of the Termination of Employment Law article 5(l) which prohibits dismissal on the ground of one's race or ethnic origin. The Court found that the Turkish invasion had brought a de facto frustration of the contract of employment and that no obligation arose for the respondent company to accept the appellant back to work.

With regard to the appellant's arguments that it was possible for him to come to work with escort and after securing the permission of the Turkish Cypriot administration, the Court found that the former would require the involvement of the authorities of the Republic of Cyprus and the latter the involvement of the Turkish Cypriot authorities both of which were outside the control of the respondent, whilst the latter (the Turkish Cypriot administration), was also illegal.

Recognition of same sex marriages

Title: Report of the Anti-discrimination authority regarding the legal recognition of the relationships between homosexual couples⁵²

Reference number: File no. AKR 142/2009, AKR 16/2010

Brief summary: The equality body received two complaints, one regarding the non-recognition of homosexual marriages and one regarding the non-recognition of registered partnerships between homosexuals by the Cypriot government. In one of the two cases, the partner of the complainant is a third country national who is forced to leave the country once his visa expires and who would have acquired residence rights if their relationship was recognised by the state. The equality body report analysed the relevant case law of the ECtHR on the issue and acknowledged that the approach followed is that of reluctance to recognise same sex relationships.⁵³ In relation to the CJEU ruling in the case of Maruko, the equality body stated that it facilitates the enactment of new equality provisions at the national level for the alternative relationships of cohabitation which may differ from the traditional structures but nevertheless express a contemporary reality which no law can ignore. The equality body recommended the introduction of a framework so as to legally recognise the cohabitation of both homosexual and heterosexual couples as a realistic policy response to an existing social need. It adds that in the case of homosexual couples the legal gap in the recognition of cohabitations inevitably leads to inequality that may not be convincingly justified.

http://www.ombudsman.gov.cy/Ombudsman/ombudsman.nsf/All/CD1ED8CBA46ED048C225771100253576/\$file/AKP142.2009%20κατ%2016.2010-31032010.doc?OpenElement.

⁵³ The exact phrase used in the Equality Body report is as follows: "In spite of this activity, it is a fact that the Court maintains a reluctant approach regarding the issue of recognition of marriages between homosexual persons. Indeed, in relation to Article 12 of the ECHR regarding the right to marriage, the ECtHR established that 'the right to marriage refers to marriage between two persons of the opposite biological sex. This may also be deduced from the phrasing of article 12 which mainly aims at protection marriage as the basis of the family (Rees v. UK, 2/1985/88/135, 17/10/1986, Markcx v. Belgium, App. No. 6833/74, 13/06/1979)'."

The report concludes that although the issue falls within the competency of the legislative branch of the state, it believes that the recognition of same sex couples will not jeopardise the traditional form of the family nor will it change its fundamental characteristics; in any case the protection of marriage and the family cannot be achieved at the expenses of the rights of couples living in free cohabitations which exist in our society as a matter of fact. Besides, concludes the report, the progressive recognition of the rights of minorities, including sexual minorities, is a feature of many democratic states where morals are constantly adjusted on the basis of social processes and where there is a constant interaction between law and society.

This report touched a sensitive chord within Cypriot society which is highly homophobic and conservative. A lively debate in the media followed the publicisation of this report, with several public persons positioning themselves against the eventuality of recognising same sex relationships. It ought to be recalled that homosexuality was only decriminalised in 1998, after an ECHR decision against Cyprus in 1993⁵⁴ and following five years of stalling.

Hospital dismisses an assistant clerk with a speech impediment

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 23 February 2010

Name of the parties: n/a

Reference number: A/P 2898/2007, A.K.I. 10/2010

Report title: Report of the anti-discrimination authority regarding the dismissal of a person with a natural disadvantage from the job of a public servant on an hourly basis

Brief summary: In December 2007 a complainant with a speech impediment lodged a complaint with the equality body against a public hospital for dismissing her from the position of assistant clerk, where she had been appointed a week earlier following her success at written and oral examinations. The reason given to her for her dismissal was that she was not working efficiently. The equality body's investigation revealed that the hospital authorities felt that the applicant's speech problem (she was slow in her speech) rendered communication with the public very difficult. The hospital authorities claimed that efforts were made to relocate her to another post where she would not have to serve the public but no such effort was recorded anywhere nor did it yield results since the complainant was dismissed one week after she started work.

⁵⁴ Modinos v. Cyprus, Judgment 22.04.1993, 16 EHRR 485 available at http://ius.info/EUII/EUCHR/dokumenti/1993/04/CASE_OF_MODINOS_v._CYPRUS_22_04_1993.html

The equality body found⁵⁵ that the complainant's speech impediment amounts to a disability according to national legislation⁵⁶ as well as according to the CJEU ruling in the case of Chacon Navas⁵⁷ where disability was defined as a disadvantage owing to a physical, intellectual or psychological illness which restricts the participation of a person in professional life for a long period of time. Based on this finding, the report concluded that the complainant's dismissal was due to her disability and thus amounted to discrimination prohibited by law, particularly as the hospital authorities failed to take reasonable accommodation measures by, for instance, delegating to the complainant other more suitable duties. The complainant remained out of work since she was dismissed and the District Labour Office does not refer her to interviews for other positions because of her dismissal from the hospital. The equality body invited both parties to a consultation prior to issuing final recommendations, stating its intention to include in the final recommendations measures for the reinstatement of the unfairness suffered by the complainant, meaning either compensation or job reinstatement or both.

Self initiated investigation of the equality body into the participation of a paraplegic student in a school charity trip

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 22 June 2010

Name of the parties: n/a

Reference number: AYT.P. 1/2009⁵⁸

Report Title: Self initiated investigation of the Anti-discrimination authority regarding the participation of a paraplegic student in the charity flight "Joy and Life"

Brief summary: The equality body launched an investigation into an incident widely reported in the media concerning the participation of a paraplegic student in a school charity event on 8 December 2008. The event consisted of a short plane tour for the students from one city to another and their transport to and from the airport by bus. An issue had arisen in the media following a complaint by the national organisation of the paraplegics that the said student had been excluded from the event because the bus selected to transport the students to and from the airport was unsuitable for paraplegics. The student's father alleged that the school authorities initially proposed that the student be assisted to board a normal bus (i.e. without accessibility features) but this was rejected by the father for reasons of safety.

⁵⁶ The Law on Persons with Disability 2000-2009 defines disability as any type of disadvantage or inefficiency which causes physical, intellectual or psychological restriction of an indefinite or permanent duration which substantially reduces or excludes the possibility of performing one or more activities or functions considered normal and essential for the quality of life for a person of the same age.

⁵⁷ Case No. C-13/05.

⁵⁸ The report in Greek is available at

http://www.ombudsman.gov.cy/Ombudsman/ombudsman.nsf/All/1E15304D39A7D509C22577050038D31B/\$file/AYT.P.%201.2009 -13042010.doc?OpenElement

Instead the father proposed that a special bus be hired for this trip, upon which he was informed by the Ministry of Education that this would involve an additional cost of 500 Euros which the Ministry was unwilling to pay just for one student. In lieu, the Ministry proposed to pay 250 Euros in order for the student in question to be transported to the airport by taxi, but this was rejected by the father because it was contrary to the team spirit that the event was trying to reinforce. The equality body report concluded that although the two sides do not entirely agree on the sequence of events, it nevertheless emerges that the Ministry of Education did not take the necessary measures to ensure the participation of the student with the kinetic disability to the school trip, even though it was aware well in advance about the special needs arising out of the participation to the trip of students from the special unit of the school. Even when the father of the student supplied information to enable the school authorities to provide for the needs of his daughter, the information was not adequately assessed by the school. The solutions proposed for the transportation of the student were superficial because they either compromised the student's safety or they provided for the individual transportation of the student to the airport by taxi. Under the circumstances, the most appropriate solution would have been the use of a special bus despite the cost, which is in any case small compared to the educational gain to be derived from the equal participation of the student to the school trip. The report recommends that the Ministry of Education studies as a matter of priority the equal participation of students with disabilities to the whole spectrum of educational activities including trips and events and adopt measures to ensure the removal of obstacles to equal participation is done in consideration of the special characteristics of every student with disability, in order to reduce educational exclusion of students with disability.

Local authority dismisses school traffic wardens aged 60 and over.

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 11 March 2010

Name of the parties: n/a

Reference number: A.K.I. 76/2009

Report title: Report of the Equality Authority regarding discrimination on the ground of age in the employment conditions of the Limassol school traffic wardens

Brief summary: The equality body received a complaint from a school traffic warden that the municipality intended to dismiss all school traffic wardens upon attaining the age of 60. According to the Municipalities' law, the date of retirement for all municipal employees attaining the age of 60 on or after 1 July 2008 is 63. The nature of the employment of the traffic wardens is rather unique: although the recruitment is done by the municipality and the training is done by the police, traffic wardens are neither municipal nor police employees; they are contracted to offer services on a part time basis. In 2007 the municipality instructed its legal advisor to draft a proposal for the regulation of the issue. As a result, a document was produced entitled "Agreement for the granting of authorisation under the municipalities' law and under the Traffic Municipal Regulations, which all traffic wardens were asked to sign.

This document provides that the authorisation to act as traffic warden shall be renewed until the traffic warden attains the age of 60 and that the authorisation is revoked upon the person attaining 60. The municipality argued that the age limit of 60 was imposed because the service has to do with the safety of children crossing the street for which an excellent physical condition and excellent reflexes are required. The municipality added that the fact that there is a long waiting list for these positions was also taken into consideration.

By invoking the CJEU rulings in the cases of *Mangold*⁵⁹ and Palacios,⁶⁰ the equality body found that the safety of the school children crossing the street is a legitimate aim within the meaning of the exception in the Law on equal treatment in employment and occupation of 2004 (transposing article 6 of the Employment Equality Directive); however the choice of the maximum age limit as a measure for the achievement of this aim was neither appropriate nor necessary, because age is not necessarily the ideal criterion for assessing one's physical condition and more objective criteria should apply. The aim may be achieved with more appropriate means which will not result in age discrimination and will rely on scientific and ascertained data rather than on general and vague probabilities and assumptions. Such means could be for instance the periodical obligatory medical test of traffic wardens in order to assess their physical condition. In response to the municipality's argument that the age limit was also intended to provide employment for the newcomers into the labour market, the equality body responded that employment policies and in particular policies regarding the creation of jobs for the unemployed are not designed by the employers (in this case the municipality) but only by the competent state organs in the framework of a national policy for the creation of jobs for the unemployed.

State grants for artificial insemination

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 27 April 2010

Name of the parties: n/a

Reference number: A.K.R. 126/2009

Report title: Report of the anti-discrimination authority regarding the scheme of subsidizing underfertile couples for artificial insemination

Brief summary: The equality body investigated a complaint against the Ministry of Health for denying financial assistance for artificial insemination to the complainant, aged 42. The Ministry's rejection of the complainant's application was based on a decision of the Council of Ministers according to which the scheme is restricted to women aged under 40, based on scientific evidence that women under 40 have more chances of a successful conception following artificial insemination.

The Ministry of Health argued that the Council of Ministers' decision was taken following advice from gynaecologists and embryologists that the chances of success in women over 40 are so limited that the grant fund would be spent in a short period of time and younger couples who had enormous chances of success would be unable to benefit from it. The equality body's report states that the chances of success of artificial insemination for every woman are based on a combination of several factors including age, physical health, diseases etc. Therefore the age criterion as the only condition of eligibility cannot sufficiently justify the exclusion of a large number of women from the scheme. The explanation offered by the Ministry of Health that if all applicants over 40 became entitled to this grant then the fund would soon be spent, does not adequately justify the exclusion of women aged 40. The fact that the number of 40+ applicants for this scheme is significantly higher compared to younger applicants indicates that the group of 40+ is more in need of support than the group of under 40. Therefore the exclusive use of the age criterion is not the most appropriate means for achieving the legitimate aim of supporting under fertile couples. The equality body recommends the introduction of a comprehensive system of assessing each application which will take into consideration a number of factors including age, the applicant's physical health, the family status, the nature and quality of family relations that will develop from having a child, the applicant's income level so as to ensure the payment of a grant as a matter of priority to those couples that meet all the conditions of eligibility.

Police operations against migrants

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 07 June 2010

Name of the parties: n/a

Reference number: AKP 127/2007, AKP 128/2007, AKP 123/2009

Report title: Report of the Anti-discrimination Authority regarding the operations of the police for check, arrest, detention and deportation of migrants with summary procedures

Brief summary: A number of complaints were submitted to the equality body about two different police operations resulting in mass arrests, detentions and deportations of migrants: in the first case following allegations about Chinese women practising prostitution; and in the second case in order to hunt down undocumented migrants. In particular, on 28.10.2007, a total of 28 Chinese women were arrested on suspicion of prostitution by under cover policemen; none of the women admitted practising prostitution and the offence was not proven. Nevertheless, the police falsely recorded that they had admitted practising prostitution and they were all subsequently deported. The second operation took place on 25.09.2009 at dawn and involved the raiding of the houses of migrants, mass transfer to police stations, use of handcuffs and the setting up of road blocks, leading to 150 migrants being forcibly transferred to police stations to ascertain the legality of their stay; out of these, 36 persons were found to be undocumented.

The operation had been televised and shown by all TV channels, invited on the spot by the police. It had also been at the centre of debates for weeks after it happened, with public figures such as the interior minister, the Nicosia Mayor and the ombudsman accusing the police of excessive use of force and for spreading xenophobia.

The equality body report invoked a number of ECHR provisions, also to be found in the Cypriot Constitution, as well as the legislative framework regarding arrests and deportations. Particular reference was made to a UN Human Rights Committee decision⁶¹ which found that police checks intended to ascertain a person's identity, motivated by one's race or ethnicity, are contrary to the principle of non-discrimination, establishing that racially motivated checks not only negatively affect one's dignity but they also contribute to the spreading of xenophobia and run contrary to the combating of racial discrimination. The report also refers to a viewpoint published by the Council of Europe Human Rights Commissioner on 20.07.2009 identifying the police practice of 'stop and check', known as 'ethnic profiling', as a form of discrimination, as well as a study of the Fundamental Rights Agency of the European Union regarding the impact of the stop and check police practice on the migrants themselves, who feel victimised and discriminated against. The stop and check of migrants without reasonable suspicion is not always conducive to the respect for fundamental rights and the principle of non-discrimination and should not be conducted on the basis of a generalised presumption of guilt against migrants or on the basis of checking out migrants at every opportunity. In the case of the operation against the Chinese women, it was clear that the deportations were carried out based solely on the testimony of the police officers who had trapped the women, without any judicial process or any admission on the part of the women some of whom were asylum seekers. The police operation of 2009 and the massive checks and arrests that followed were motivated by a presumption of guilt, in violation of the constitution. Also the road blocks, the fact that the operation took place at dawn, the use of handcuffs and the media coverage casts doubts on the targeted nature of the operation and on the proportionality of the measure. The equality body recommended the adoption of the following measures: Police checks must not be based on the presumption that a person's ethnic origin renders it by definition a suspect nor should it be based on stereotypes and prejudices connecting a person's colour religion or ethnic origin with the chances of having committed an offence; summary deportations are prohibited and each deportation must ensure that the person affected has been offered the opportunity to subject the deportation procedure to judicial review; racial profiling should be clearly defined and prohibited by law and the police should reinforce its measures against this practise by issuing clear guidelines; the police should consider hiring migrants as police officers as a measure to reinforce trust between the police and the migrant community and legal obstacles such as the requirement that police officers must have Cypriot nationality should be lifted.

Exemption from religious instruction class

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 07 November 2010

Reference number: A.K.R. 135/2009

Brief summary: A complaint relating to the procedure followed by the Ministry of Education for the exemption of students from religious instruction class in state schools was submitted to the Equality Body by the parents of a student who is a Jehova's Witness. The student in question was exempted from the class following the parents' request but, contrary to the Ministry's instructions, the school forced her to remain alone in the courtyard while her classmates were attending the religious education class. The Ministry's instructions were that exempted secondary school students should be engaged in special projects during religious education class, while primary school students should be transferred to another classroom for that period. The schoolgirl's parents were also asked by the school to sign a declaration that they release the school from any obligation in the event that something happens to their daughter during her stay in the courtyard. The Equality Body report criticised the school regulations which provide for the exemption of students from religious education class only if they are 'not of Christian Orthodox faith'. The report adds that a person's religion constitutes sensitive personal data that should not be revealed unless there is objective and reasonable justification serving a legitimate aim. In the present case, these two requirements were not in place. The report further criticised the fact that the framework for exempting students from school activities such as national celebrations, church-going and processions remains vague and problematic. The uncertainty and vagueness of the regulations governing exemption from religious education class often leads to a violation of religious freedom. The treatment afforded to students and parents who are forced to reveal their religious convictions is incompatible with the principle of freedom of thought, conscience and religion, guaranteed by the Constitution and by international conventions ratified by the Republic of Cyprus (e.g. ECHR and Protocol 12). In the case under examination, the handling by the Ministry of Education led to the stigmatisation of the student-complainant, as she was for several months isolated from her classmates; even though the decision for her exemption was made in September 2009, this was not fully applied until April 2010, indicating that the issue was not addressed with due seriousness, leading to her unfavourable treatment on the ground of religion. In concluding, the Equality Body set out the following recommendations:

- School regulations must be amended to the effect that students may be exempted from the religious education class without having to reveal their religious beliefs and for reasons of conscience;
- The Ministry of Education is required to prepare a special form for parents to complete when requesting exemption from religious education class and from school celebrations. The form should expressly state that there is no obligation to reveal one's religion. The form should be circulated to parents upon enrolment of their children at the school.

- Continuous training of all school employees responsible for handling exemptions, to ensure that students are not stigmatised as a result of their religion and that their rights are respected.

Retroactive effect of disability benefit

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 20 August 2009

Name of the parties: 11/12/2010

Reference number: A.K.I. 76/2010 & A/P 1840/2007

Brief summary: A complaint against the Social Welfare Services was submitted to the Equality Body by a person with disability who had applied for a disability benefit in 2005 and was only granted this benefit in 2010 without retroactive effect. The complainant, aged 39, was a former athlete with an international career who had been operated on the knee as a result of an injury. During the operation he was infected with gangrene and developed severe osteoarthritis of the joint that spread throughout his bones. This rendered him unable to work and to care for himself, he suffered from severe pain and sometimes he was unable to sleep. In September 2005 he applied for a disability benefit. The examination of his application lasted for five years, during which the complainant was repeatedly asked to submit updated medical certificates, he was twice visited by welfare officers who testified that his condition warranted his categorization as a person with disability (and thus confirming his eligibility to a disability benefit) and he was also examined twice by a medical council upon the request of the Social Welfare Services. In 2010 it was finally decided by the Social Welfare Services that he fitted the definition of 'person with disability' and his application for a disability benefit was approved, but with effect only as from 15.06.2010. He applied to the Equality Body seeking to amend this decision, so that the benefit has retroactive effect. In its decision, the Equality Body referred to its mandate to promote equality of opportunity irrespective of, inter alia, special needs, in the field of social protection. Reference was also made to the Opinion of the European Economic and Social Committee on Equality of Opportunity for Persons with Disability⁶² which encourages member states to put emphasis on the provision of social services and personal assistance to persons with disability, so as to enable them to lead a smooth life and play an active role in society. The report further referred to the social right to welfare foreseen in the European Social Charter which guarantees the securing of a minimum subsistence level, which is not merely related to satisfying basic needs but extends to all the needs imposed by respect to human dignity. The right to a dignified standard of living, through economic provisions and social services is also provided for in the national Law on Persons with Disabilities 2000-2007 (article 4).

The definition of disability found in the Public Assistance and Services Law 2006, article 2 covers any insufficiency or disadvantage causing physical mental or psychological restrictions which is permanent or of indefinite duration and which, taking into consideration the history and other personal data of the said person, reduces significantly or excludes the performance of activities or functions considered normal and essential for the quality of life of a person without such insufficiency or disadvantage. Although on the basis of the medical certificates submitted by the complainant it was clear that he fitted the legal definition of a person with disability and that he was eligible for disability benefit, the Social Welfare Services unjustifiably delayed the approval of his application for five years. Reference was also made to the Social Welfare Services' precondition that the applicant be examined by a medical council in order to determine whether he was a person with disability, despite the fact that the competence to decide whether a person meets the requirements of the definition of 'disability' rests with the Director of Social Welfare and not with the medical council. Finally the report concludes that since the Law on General Principles of Administrative law permits the retroactive effect of an administrative act in order to restore an unfairness resulting from the administration's omission, the disability benefit granted to the complainant should have retroactive effect from September 2005 when he submitted his application.

Posting of teacher with a child with disability

Date of decision: 25 June 2010

Name of the parties: n/a

Reference number: A.K.I. 82/2009

Brief summary:⁶³ A teacher with a ten month old child with a disability complained to the equality body that she was posted in a school away from her place of residence. She had complained to the Commission for Education Service (CES), based on a regulation which entitles the CES to transfer teachers upon request when they are pregnant or caring for a child under 12 months old, explaining that the condition of her child was such that regular therapy sessions were required. The CES failed to respond to the repeated letters of both the complainant and of the equality body. The equality body noted that in general the civil service appears reluctant to adopt measures to enable women to reconcile professional and family life, often arguing that any favourable treatment of women pregnant or caring for small children would place other civil servants in a disadvantageous position.

⁶³ The full report in Greek is available at http://www.ombudsman.gov.cy/Ombudsman/ombudsman.nsf/All/A85BC1134AC8CAA2C225775800374FBD/\$file/AKI82.2009-25062010.doc?OpenElement

In its decision, the equality body referred to the CJEU decision in the case of Coleman⁶⁴ stating that the prohibition of disability discrimination provided for in The Employment Equality Directive and in its transposing legislation (N. 127(I)/2000 as amended) is not restricted to workers with a disability but extends to workers, who although they do not have a disability themselves, are responsible for the care of a person with disability. Reference was also made to the Law on persons with disabilities which provides (in article 3B(1)) that nothing shall prevent the more favourable treatment of a person with disability in employment which although at first sight may appear as discriminatory towards other workers, it aims at preventing or balancing disadvantage due to disability. The report concludes that on the basis of the aforementioned interpretation by the CJEU, more favourable treatment may be extended to the carers of persons with disability without raising issues of violating the equality principle. Although the CES did not react in any way and did not communicate its position on the matter, it is clear that it declined the complainant's application, evidenced by the fact that it proceeded to post her in another far away school after she has filed her complaint. The report states that the same policy was followed by the CES in other cases, resulting in discrimination on the ground of gender against women who were either pregnant or the main carers of their babies, adding that the practice of not taking into account the particularities of the situation of a pregnant worker or a working mother amounts to a violation of the principle that one must not treat equally two unequal things. The equality body declared its intention to issue a recommendation and thus invited the two parties to a consultation, in accordance with the procedure prescribed in the law.

The case and the stand took by the CES is another manifestation of the problematic approach followed by public authorities and the Courts in Cyprus, that essentially considers favourable treatment as violating the equality principle enshrined in the Cypriot constitution, despite the fact that EU laws which permit positive action are superior to any national laws. The dispute goes back to 2002 when a Supreme Court decision declared void and unconstitutional, a set of legal provisions granting priority to employment in the public sector to persons with disabilities⁶⁵ and to persons related to the dead and the missing from the 1974 war or with war-related disabilities Law,⁶⁶ on a the basis of a quota system. The Court's reasoning was based on an interpretation of Article 28 of the Constitution that such priority discriminates against other candidates eligible for appointment in the public service. As a result, Law No.245/1987, which had up until then provided priority to qualified candidates with disabilities for appointment in the public education sector, was abolished.

Subsidies for minority schools

⁶⁴ S. Coleman v. Attridge Law and Steve Law C-303/06

⁶⁵ Law No.245/1987.

Reference number: A.K.R. 114/2005

Brief summary: In October 2005 a complaint was submitted to the equality body by the representative of the Maronite⁶⁷ community against the Ministry of Education regarding the Ministry's failure to raise the subsidies for the school fees of Maronite students attending private schools. The complaint referred to the fact that the subsidies have remained constant since 1996 despite the fact that school fees have more than doubled since. Despite the existence of public schools offering specialised education for the members of the religious minorities, the majority of the students belonging to the minority groups choose to attend private schools which do not offer specialised minority education. In particular, for the school year 2006-7, out of 359 minority students attending secondary education, only 87 were enrolled at the schools specialising for minorities. The subsidies offered by the state for attending the minority schools (termed as 'national schools') were double the subsidies offered for attending the private 'non-national' schools. The complainant argued that for 11 years the subsidy had not been increased whilst the fees had at least doubled. He also stated that Maronites and Armenians prefer to send their children to the 'non-national' private schools where the education provided is secular and not 'ethno-religious' as in the 'national' schools', adding that the minorities' students were being offered only one option, that of the 'national schools', whilst the majority children (of Greek Cypriot origin) had a wide choice of public schools they can attend free of charge. The Ministry of Finance reacted to this with the position that even the current subsidy is unfair to the majority students who receive no subsidy to attend private schools because they do not belong to a minority and who might also prefer secular to ethno-national education, adding that the position of the state is to promote the enrolment of the minorities' students to the public 'national' schools, because the private schools do not contribute to the preservation of the national identity of the minorities in question more than the public schools. The Ministry added that Greek Cypriot students have less options than the minorities' students, as the former may attend for free only the public schools, while the latter in addition to the public schools they have the option of attending for free their own 'national schools'. By contrast, the Ministry of Education recommended the doubling of the subsidy and also referred to the efforts currently under way in the framework of the holistic educational reform aimed at moving away from the 'ethno-national' model towards the multi-cultural humanistic model of education. The equality body report highlighted the obligations undertaken by the Republic under the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, which states in article 4 that measures adopted to promote full equality shall not be deemed as acts of discrimination.

Particular reference was made to the Second Opinion of the Advisory Committee for the implementation of the Convention dated 07.06.2007 which approved of the subsidy given to the minorities to attend private schools “if that is their wish” and encouraged the authorities to examine carefully the educational needs of the three minorities in consultation with their representatives with a view to finding ways to satisfy them. The report found that whilst Greek Cypriot students have a wide choice of schools to attend, the minorities’ students can receive education which is suitable to their national origin and culture only in two private schools, one in Nicosia and one in Limassol; the Armenians in particular have no options as regards secondary education since the Armenian school ‘Melkonian’ ceased operations in 2005. The report notes that in order to achieve full equality, the legislative framework recognises deviations from the principle of equality and special treatment of the members of the minorities. It added that even though the private secular schools chosen by the minorities’ parents do not offer education relevant to the origin and culture of the minorities, they nevertheless offer a school environment which is conducive to the preservation of a minority child’s special identity. The report concluded that the refusal to increase the subsidy given that school fees are increasing all the time would essentially mean the eventual elimination of a right recognised to the minorities in 1980, when the subsidy was first granted, which was even before they were recognised as national minorities under the Convention with wide educational rights. It pointed out that the cost of satisfying this request is relatively low and that the increase of the subsidy is favoured both by the Ministry of Education and by the Advisory Committee for the Implementation of the Framework Convention which encouraged the authorities to satisfy the minorities’ educational claims. In view of the above the equality body concluded that the claim of the minorities for increasing the school fees subsidy for the private secular schools should be favourably considered.

The above case indirectly identifies two important problems: first the ethnocentric character of the public schools and secondly, the mentality that continues to be prevalent amongst policy makers in key positions that affording special treatment to a disadvantaged group amounts to discrimination against the mainstream group..

The policy of the Open University to favour older students

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 22 November 2010

Name of the parties: N/a

Reference number: A.K.I. 74/2009

Brief summary: A complainant applied to the Equality Body regarding the ‘points system’ used by the Open University for the purposes of admission, which allegedly excluded him on the ground of his age; this complaint was subsequently withdrawn by the complainant after his application for admission was accepted. The Equality Body nevertheless decided to investigate the matter on its own right, since the procedure involved prima facie indirect discrimination on the ground of age. The Open University is a state owned educational institution offering open and distance education, addressing the demand for life-long learning.

The procedure for admission to the Open University takes into consideration a number of 'points' in order to decide on admission of applicants. One of the criteria is the number of years which have elapsed from obtaining a school leaving certificate, which potentially means that older applicants will be preferred. In its exchange with the Equality Body, the Open University admitted applying a policy of preferential treatment towards older applicants, in an effort to avoid discrimination against them in favour of younger applicants who have more opportunities to find a place to study in conventional universities.

In its decision, the Equality Body referred to an CJEU ruling⁶⁸ establishing that access to university education which prepares the student for obtaining a qualification or a special skill for a certain profession or occupation amounts to access to vocational training. Taking this as a departure point, the report goes on to describe the legislative framework regarding the prohibition of discrimination on the ground of age in access to vocational training including the exceptions foreseen in the law transposing Directive 2000/78EC, with references to the CJEU rulings in the cases of *Mangold*⁶⁹ and Palacios.⁷⁰ The report then states that it has approached the issue from the perspective of the right to education which is guaranteed by the Cypriot Constitution (article 20.1), by the First (Additional) Protocol to the European Convention for Human Rights (article 2) and by Article 5(a) of the Open University Law of 2002 which describes the University's mission as providing to all equal opportunities for learning irrespective of age, place and time of studying. Although the report does not elaborate on the relevance of these legislative provisions, these offer the general equality principle, without the notion of positive action in favour of traditionally disadvantaged groups. In its conclusion, the report states that each case has its own facts and that it is not a rule that younger candidates have more opportunities to study at conventional universities or, vice versa, that older candidates have less opportunities or have not already studied in a conventional university. Finally, the report states that the justification for the criterion under examination does not concern labour market policies, which must in any case be decided by the state and not by educational institutions; as such it does not fall under the exception of the law transposing The Employment Equality Directive, which allows differential treatment on the ground of age when this refers to labour market policies. The report concludes that the criterion of the number of years which have elapsed since leaving school introduces discrimination prohibited by law and as such should cease to be applied.

The report reproduces to some extent the problematic approach followed by Cypriot policy makers and legal circles, which view the equality principle contained in the constitution as prohibitive of any positive action in favour of vulnerable or traditionally disadvantaged groups.

⁷⁰ C-411/05, dated 16.10.2007.

To state that older university candidates do not necessarily have less opportunities to study is ignoring the realities facing older people, in favour of a rather legalistic approach that wants each case to turn upon its own facts. In conclusion, the Open University is not merely required to abandon its policy of favouring older applicants in the case of those courses which offer skill or qualifications relating to a professional practice, but in relation to all its courses. Also, the equality body requires from the Open University to abandon its policy of preferring older candidates not only in favour of young candidates, who may arguably also be potential victims of age discrimination, but in favour of all applicants irrespective of age. This essentially requires a departure from the rule of positive action in favour of vulnerable groups and seeks to enforce the equality principle on unequal situations.

Funding for radical prostatectomy to patients over 65

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 24 November 2010

Reference number: AKR 164/2008, AKR 63/2010

Brief summary: Two complainants applied to the Equality Body against the Ministry of Health alleging age discrimination in the rejection of their applications for funding in order to have radical prostatectomy conducted abroad. The position of the Ministry of Health was that the state covers the expenses of robotic prostatectomy conducted abroad to patients with a life expectancy of over 10 years. For patients aged 65-70, the state provides the procedure of open radical prostatectomy which can be conducted in state hospitals in Cyprus. Robotic prostatectomy is made available (through funding in order to travel abroad to have it done) only to patients aged under 65. The competent Urologists Committee set the ceiling of 65 as the age justifying treatment abroad for the purpose of preserving the erection nerves during the radical prostatectomy; patients aged above 65 were not funded to have this operation abroad, as the open prostatectomy was available in Cyprus. Although the chances of survival are the same in both methods of treatment, the open prostatectomy entails the possibility of losing the function of an erection. In deciding on the ceiling of 65 as the age until which the state covers the expenses of patients having the robotic prostatectomy, the Ministry of Health took into consideration its own presumption that men aged over 65 have, to a higher or lesser degree, problems with erection which become increasingly serious with age. In its decision, the Equality Body stated it was not convinced that the exception to the principle of equal treatment practiced in relation to the covering of expenses for persons over 65 is based on a legitimate aim or that the measure is necessary. Furthermore, in spite of the seriousness of the consequences from the Ministry's decision over a large group of persons, the considerations of the Ministry are expressed in a very vague manner⁷¹ and do not derive from research or reliable data.

⁷¹ The reference here is to the Ministry's expressed position that men over 65 have erection problems of higher or lesser degree.

Also, the calculation of life expectancy of Cypriot men was based on the Ministry's personal assessment which is not justified by data nor is it consistent with contemporary realities such as the increase of life expectancy in EU countries. The report expresses particular concern over the Ministry's attribution of erection problems to all men over 65 without objective data irrespective of their state of health and in complete disregard to their rights to sexual life, adding that this sweeping generalization based on a groundless 'life expectancy' leads to the exclusion and discrimination of patients over 65 and ignores critical personal matters, touching upon the nucleus of the right to family life and human dignity. The equality body recommended that the applications of the two complainants are re-examined in light of the findings of this report. It further recommended that the Ministry's scheme for funding operations abroad be revised so as to eliminate age discrimination, which should be allowed only exceptionally and justified strictly in relation to a particular aim based on data derived from research of scientific knowledge.

Property law provisions discriminate against Turkish Cypriots

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 25 August 2010

Reference number: AKP 6/2009, AKP 23/2010

Brief summary: Two complaints were submitted to the equality body claiming that certain provisions of the national property law⁷² discriminate against Turkish-Cypriots. The preamble to this law explains that this law became necessary due to the "anomalous situation" resulting from the 1964 inter-communal strife between Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots. The law effectively vests the Director of the Land Registry with discretion to decide as to whether a person is to be allowed to acquire land: the Director is thus given power to "exercise his/her judgement on the basis of the facts whether the acquisition of land places at risk or by any means affects public security". If the Director deems that this is the case, s/he can deny the transfer of the property, unless approval is given by the Interior Minister. In practice this provision, which appears neutral, has been activated only in the cases of Turkish-Cypriots attempting to acquire or sell land. The procedure applies to Turkish Cypriot properties which were not considered 'abandoned' by Turkish Cypriots; for the 'abandoned' properties a different regime comes into operation which places these properties under the custodianship of the Interior Minister.⁷³ The complaint submitted to the equality body alleged that the procedure of approval of property transactions by the Interior Minister poses a number of problems amounting to violations of national and European law, namely: Article 23 of the constitution (right to property), article 1 of the Protocol 1 of the European Convention of Human Rights, the right to property as stipulated in the Acquis and the doctrine of separation of powers, since it is left to the executive to decide on a fundamental human rights issue which has no relation to the any notion of 'security', 'necessity' etc.

⁷² Immovable Property (Temporary Provisions) Law N. 49/1970.

⁷³ Law on Turkish Cypriot Properties N. 139/1991.

Both complainants argued that the procedure for approval by the Interior Minister of the act of transfer of the property results in discriminatory treatment against Turkish Cypriots on the ground of their ethnic origin. The equality body found that the procedure of approval by the Interior Minister of the property transfers to or from Turkish Cypriots amounts to a restriction of the right to property because the completion of the transaction depends on the approval of a third party (the Interior Minister) and is not exclusively dependent upon the will of the contracting parties. The report notes that the procedure applies only when Turkish Cypriots are involved, which is prima facie discriminatory, since individual cases are given different treatment by the law depending on the ethnic origin of the persons involved. The report states that the restriction would have been acceptable had it been objectively and reasonably justified and serving a legitimate aim, which was not the case here; it could not reasonably be claimed that every single property transaction with Turkish Cypriots involves security and public order issues. The report concluded that the implementation of Law 49/1970 has in practice resulted in discriminatory treatment that cannot be justified and therefore calls on the authorities to review the question of applying the provisions of Law 49/1970 to all transfers to and from Turkish Cypriots

Equality body decisions in 2008 and 2009

The equality body offers an opinion on reasonable accommodation at the workplace for persons with disability

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 20 August 2009

Reference number: A.I.T. 1/2009

Brief summary: In 2007 the equality body investigated the policy framework of the posting of teachers following the complaint of a blind teacher who was transferred from school to school without taking her disability into account. The investigation showed that a teacher's posting was determined only by the needs of the service without reference to the existence of any disability. At the time, the equality body found that transfers and posting of teachers are employment terms which must be exercised in compliance with the equality principle established by the disability laws and that the transfer or posting without taking a disability into consideration is a neutral practice that may result in discrimination. The equality body had further recommended (and the Ministry of Education complied) that the a list of teachers with disability be drawn up and that whenever teachers in that were to be transferred, they should be invited to state what reasonable accommodation measures they would require in order to enable them to work in the new environment. In June 2009 the Ministry asked the equality body to provide an opinion as to whether requests received from teachers with a disability to have their teaching hours reduced amount to reasonable accommodation or whether it may be deemed as casting a disproportionate burden on the employer.

The Equality body found that the reduction in teaching hours can amount to a reasonable accommodation measure provided the case is such that the symptoms or the side effects of the disability render teaching painful or particularly exhausting and therefore in need of frequent periods of rest. On the question whether this measure may create an unreasonable burden for the employer, the equality body referred to article 5(1A) of the Laws on Persons with disability 2000-2007 which provides that a burden will not be deemed as disproportionate when balanced by measures taken by the state in favour of persons with disability, pointing out to the possibility of the state securing funding from the European Social Fund in order to finance measures for the social integration of persons with special needs.

The equality body finds disability discrimination in the rejection of a job application

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 21 September 2009

Name of the parties: n/a

Reference number: A.K.I. 12/2009

Brief summary: A job applicant who suffers from chondroplasia, as a result of which she is very short, was turned down upon arrival for an interview at the office of the accounting firm which had advertised for a vacancy. The complainant, who had been informed over the phone that she would be interviewed for the position and would be asked to do a practical exercise to prove her skills, was not interviewed and was not allowed to undergo the practical exercise; instead as soon as the manager of the firm saw her he told her that he cannot hire her.

The applicant complained to the equality body that she was rejected as a result of her disability. The firm justified this rejection by claiming that the position required the reaching of files and equipment which was out of the reach of the applicant. It argued that had it been a larger firm it would have been able to hire the applicant and allocate to her only duties commensurate to her physical abilities, such as entries into a computer, however given the small size of the business (3 persons who are often out of the office) they could not afford to do such allocation of tasks. The equality body found that there was direct discrimination in access to employment on the ground of disability in violation of The Employment Equality Directive and of the laws on disability. The report states that the obstacle mentioned by the manager of the firm, that the documents and the equipment which the complainant would be required to use were at a certain height, could easily have been overcome without significant expenditure by placing a ladder for libraries in the office and/or by relocating the equipment and or documents at a lower shelf. The report further concludes that the complainant was denied the opportunity to have a fair interview clearly because of being short, owing to her disability.

The Equality Body finds that a law setting a preference in employment for blind persons as telephonists discriminates against persons with other disabilities

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 19 November 2009

Reference number: 2/2009

Brief summary: The equality body investigated a complaint on behalf of a person with severe kinetic disability, claiming that the Law Providing for the Hiring of Trained Blind Telephonists in the Public and the Educational Sector and in Public Bodies (Special Provisions) N. 17/1988 (hereinafter 'the Law') introduces discrimination against persons with other types of disability. The complainant claimed that his application for the post of a telephonist in a public hospital was rejected as a result of the Law and that this contravenes the law transposing The Employment Equality Directive.

The position of the Department of Public Administration and Personnel was that the equal treatment of persons with disability is not and cannot be the result of mathematical equation; that positive action measures are adopted upon consideration of real factors; and that any other treatment would result in equal treatment of unequal situations which is as unacceptable as unequal treatment. Article 3 of the Law provides that if blind persons are not available to fill vacancies for telephonists, then such positions will be offered to persons with other disability. However, the same provision requires all candidates to be 'adequately trained' telephonists and such training is offered only by a single special school and only to blind persons. The equality body found that the scope of The Employment Equality Directive includes any direct or indirect discrimination of any person whether belonging to the wider category of persons with disability or to any subgroup of this category. It notes that the Directive allows a deviation from the equality principle only for the purpose of realising essential equality and under the condition that it is objectively and reasonable justified.

The purpose of positive action measures is the historical rehabilitation of groups which had been discriminated against in the past. It added that when a benefit is granted by law, the failure to grant the same benefit to a same condition violates the principle of equality. The report concludes that blind persons and persons with severe kinetic disability experience their social and labour exclusion equally painfully and must thus be seen as equal. The complaint was therefore deemed to be well-founded and the Law, which introduces less favourable provisions for a subgroup of persons with disability without being objectively and reasonable justified, violates the equality principle. As such, the law was referred to the Attorney General for revision under article 39(1) of the Combating of Racial and Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law.

Equality Body decision on the right of a person who acquired a disability after the age of 65 to receive public benefit

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 10 April 2009

Reference number: A.K.R 34/2008

Brief summary: The Equality Body investigated a complaint against the Welfare Services for rejecting an application for state benefit from a person aged 84 who lost both feet in an accident in 2005 and additionally suffers from diabetes and high blood pressure. The complainant's application had been rejected because he does not fall within the definition of "person with a disability" contained in article 2 of the Public Benefits Law, since the event which caused his disability took place after his 65th year. Although two welfare officers have testified that the health problems facing the complainant are such so as to warrant the granting of a public benefit, the Welfare Services nevertheless refused to exercise their discretion granted to them by the law⁷⁴ in order to grant him any benefit

The report states that although there is no law at present prohibiting discrimination on the ground of age in social protection, a draft Directive has been issued⁷⁵ which secures equal treatment on the ground of age in the field of social protection. The exception provided in paragraph 6(2) of the draft Directive allows differential treatment on the ground of age where this is justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving it are appropriate, but any deviations from the equality principle must be defined narrowly.⁷⁶ The report concludes that in view of the aforesaid provisions, the wider institutional framework covers all forms of discrimination on the ground of age, to the effect that any differential treatment on account of age must be objectively and convincingly justified.

Drawing on this conclusion, the report found that the differential treatment of two categories of persons with disabilities on the ground of age (those who acquired a disability before they attained 65 and those who acquired it after 65) is a paradox that causes discrimination which cannot be objectively justified. The economic consequences for state funds which would result from eliminating this differentiation do not justify the deviation from the equality principle and these consequences may be addressed by the institutionalisation of procedures through which individual cases may be evaluated scientifically. The Equality Body submitted this report to the Ministry of Labour with the recommendation that the views contained are taken into consideration in the discussions currently taking place regarding the review of the said law, recommending that the law is revised in order to comply with the equality principle. With regard to the complainant's application, the Equality Body recommends that the Welfare Services exercise their discretion to grant him public benefit in view of the seriousness of the health problems he is facing.

The Equality Body decides on complaint regarding discrimination in the procedure followed by the District Administration in the issue of birth certificate and passport for Turkish Cypriots

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 18 May 2009

Reference number: AKP 138/2008

Brief Summary: The Equality Body investigated a complaint from a Turkish Cypriot that he had suffered discrimination on account of his ethnic origin in the procedure for the issue of a birth certificate and a passport for his son. In particular, the complainant had applied to the Citizens Service Bureau⁷⁷ for the issue of these documents, as is the procedure for Greek Cypriots, where he was informed that because he was a Turkish Cypriot he had to apply directly to the District Administration instead. Upon enquiry from the Equality Body, the Citizen's Advice Bureau tried to justify the practice of referring Turkish Cypriots to the District Administration by stating that there he can avail himself to the services of an interpreter, who can also record Turkish names correctly.

The Citizens Service Bureau justified the referral to the District Administration arguing that the Citizens Service Bureau does not have electronic access to the database where the personal data Turkish Cypriots is kept, on the basis that, for Turkish Cypriots, a special police investigation must be carried out to verify the authenticity of the documents submitted, which is the reason why the documents could not be issued to the complainant on the same day. According to the authorities, this procedure was deemed necessary because of instances of false documents being presented. However, no such verification check is carried out by the police in the case of Greek Cypriots.

The Equality Body found that the practice of applying a different procedure for the issue of documents for Turkish Cypriots without an individual assessment of the real and legal circumstances of each case is unjustified. The fact that this special arrangement applies for some cases of Greek Cypriots but for all cases of Turkish Cypriots reinforces the conclusion that discrimination exists. The Equality Body recommended that the current practice be reviewed and all elements of discrimination and inconvenience be eradicated.

Equality Body recommends the adoption of special measures in order to implement the right to education of the Maronite community

Reference number: A.K.R. 93/2005

⁷⁷ The Citizen's Advice Bureau offers a far more efficient, fast and customer-friendly procedure than the District Administration, where people often get caught in the red tape of bureaucracy.

Brief Summary: The Parliamentary representative of the Maronite Community submitted a complaint to the Equality Body regarding the staffing of the Maronite school and the teaching of the Maronite language. He claimed that, although the Maronite school was set up in order to preserve the Maronite identity, not all teachers appointed there are Maronites and the Maronite language is not being taught. The state educational committee responsible for the appointment of teachers responded that the said school was set up as a regional school for Maronite and other pupils and it is subject to the laws regarding public education service.

The committee added that it investigated the possibility of appointing Maronite teachers to the said school but none of them showed any interest, pointing out that the law does not allow the transfer of teachers from school to school at the discretion of the Educational Committee. The Ministry of Education responded that the administration of the school is carried out by a committee of Maronites appointed by the Council of Ministers; that the majority of teachers (5 out of 9) are Maronites; that the proposal for extending the service of the Maronite head of the school could not be adopted because it was contrary to retirement regulations; that the Ministry of Education is willing to introduce teaching of Maronite history, culture and language and has assigned the preparation of special curricula to experts, but the contribution of the Maronite religious committee to these initiatives has not been submitted yet; that some of the proposals of the Maronite community have already been adopted, e.g. the religious class is taught by a Maronite teacher, the Maronite parish priest is teaching at the optional all-day school and is allowed to visit the school monthly and speak with pupils etc.

The equality body criticised the line of argumentation of the Ministry of Education which offered the Maronite community only equal treatment before the law, adding that the protection of national minorities must go beyond that, to recognise and promote rights of a collective character. The decision states that special treatment involves deviations from the principle of equality, which take the form of positive measures or special rights targeting a certain group aiming at the elimination of discrimination.

The decision finds the claim of the Maronite community regarding the staffing of the school reasonable; it further proposes that the staffing issue is detached from the usual procedure followed for the placement of teachers in schools and that it is formulated as a positive measure. The Equality Body recommends that the Ministry of Education initiates an amendment to the law regarding transfers of teachers in such a manner so that the Maronite school is staffed with as many Maronite teachers as possible and so that the filling of the position of the school head with a Maronite is facilitated. The decision also recommends the introduction of the teaching of the Cypriot Maronite language so as to comply with the Charter for the Protection of Regional or Minority Languages, as well as the adoption of measures so that the institutional role of the representative of the religious groups, as provided by the relevant law, is exercised in a meaningful manner.

The decision does not describe the current policy or legislative framework as discriminatory but offers recommendations in an effort to mediate and facilitate implementation of the right to access to education.

The Equality Body rules on complaints for unlawful discrimination in the instructions issued by the teachers' union to its members to oppose visits by Turkish Cypriots to primary schools.

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 05 June 2009

Reference number: AKR 28/2009, AKR 24/2009

Brief summary: The Equality Body investigated two complaints against a circular issued by the primary school teachers' union urging its members to refuse to implement the year's targets set by the Ministry of Education for the development of a culture of peaceful coexistence with the Turkish Cypriots, with particular emphasis to the measure of visits by Turkish Cypriot teachers and pupils. The complaints alleged that the teachers' union circular cultivates fear and distance amongst the pupils of each community and essentially urges the teachers to discriminate against Turkish Cypriot pupils and teachers, which is an unlawful act of direct discrimination contrary to the EU anti-discrimination acquis as transposed by the relevant Cypriot legislation. In response to the complaints, the teachers' union argued that the visits by Turkish Cypriots are likely to disturb the smooth operation of the schools due to feelings and sensitivities which such visits would stir. The Equality Body found that the circular of the teachers' union indicates a mistrust and suspicion towards Turkish Cypriot pupils and teachers and that the union's reaction had been "rushed". It also found that the issue emerging from the visits of Turkish Cypriots is not restricted to these visits but extends to the general educational targets set by the Ministry of Education in favour of peaceful coexistence between the two communities.

It noted that these encounters could promote the idea of natural contacts amongst children from the two communities through education, essentially contributing towards the implementation of the general aim of developing a culture of peaceful coexistence in society.

Regarding the union's concerns about the disturbance of the smooth operation of the schools, the Equality Body points out that the educational system has the necessary mechanisms at its disposal to address such problems if they arise. The report calls upon the teachers' union to reconsider their position regarding the visits of Turkish Cypriots to Greek Cypriot schools but does not deliver a full-blown decision that the union's action amounted to unlawful discrimination.

The Equality Body finds unlawful discrimination in the decision of a building's management firm to deny to a person with a disability access to the communal disabled toilet.

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 14 May 2009

Reference number: A.K.I. 91/2008

Brief Summary: The Equality Body investigated a complaint from a person with a disability that he was denied the key to a disabled toilet situated at the ground floor of the building where he was residing. The firm which had the responsibility for the management of the building initially had informed him that they would supply him with the key to the said toilet on condition that he would in due course supply further documents in evidence of his disability but subsequently cancelled their decision upon discovery that the certificate he had presented in proof of his disability (UK's 'blue badge') was only applicable to preferential parking and only within UK.

The Equality Body's report made reference to section 6(2)(d)(ii) of the Law on Persons with Disabilities which provides that the failure to carry out alterations to services or facilities which renders their use by a person with a disability unjustifiably difficult does not amount to equal treatment. Reference was also made to the Streets and Buildings Regulation 61G which defines a person with disability as a person facing temporary or permanent difficulty in accessing a building or a street due to physical weakness or deficiency. According to the Equality Body, this definition aims at securing accessibility to built infrastructure not only for persons with a disability in the narrow sense of the term but persons generally encountering obstacles in access, such as the elderly, stressing that the law does not set any preconditions which must be met in order for persons facing mobility obstacles to have access to communal toilets, nor does it require such persons to produce any documents to prove their disability. In the absence of any such preconditions in the law, then the persons entitled to access to the disabled toilet of the common areas of a building are those falling within the broad definition of the Streets and Buildings Regulation 61G. The Equality Body stated that it was satisfied that the complainant fell within the law's definition of person with a disability and recommended that the complainant be given a key to the communal disabled toilet, which must be cleaned and maintained by the management firm of the building.

Equality Body finds that the state pension law contains unlawful discrimination on the ground of age

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 04 June 2009

Name of the parties: n/a

Reference number: A.K.I. 63/2008; A.K.I. 1/2009

Brief summary: The Equality Body investigated two complaints received from public servants alleging that article 27 of the Pensions Law contains unlawful age discrimination.

The said legal provision states that public servants aged 45 and over, with at least 5 years of service, may take early retirement upon which they immediately receive a lump sum whilst the pension is paid upon attaining the age of 55. By contrast, persons aged less than 45 years and with 3 years of service receive upon early retirement a portion of the lump sum paid to those aged 45 and over and lose their right to a pension. In defence of this provision, the Public Service Department argued that it was intended to discourage scientific staff from leaving the public service which would negatively affect the smooth operation of the public service. It further argued that the Pensions Law is not in breach of the law transposing Directive 78/2000 because it serves a legitimate aim, i.e. the maximum utilisation of the knowledge and experience of public servants acquired at the cost of the state; and that the said law is not breached because it provides an exception from the non-discrimination rule in the cases of age limits in access to pension benefits. The Equality Body found that the case under examination does not fall within this exception of the Directive, since the age limit fixed is not related to access to pension benefits but concerns the age of voluntary retirement.

Citing the CJEU decisions in *Mangold*⁷⁸ and *Palacios*⁷⁹ the report found that the measure must be proportionate, objective and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim. The report concludes that the measure is not proportionate, as it covers not only scientific but also non-scientific personnel, which amounts to 2/3 of the public service workforce; that the measure does not serve a legitimate aim because the shortages in scientific personnel have since been covered; and that the age limit poses an excessive restriction on the freedom of movement of labour, as the aim could have been achieved by introducing a condition that pension benefits are payable upon completion of certain years of service irrespective of age. The Equality Body referred this law to the Attorney General in order to take measures for its review. At the time of writing, no such measures had been taken.

Equality Body criticizes the handling of a racist attack by the police and by the school authorities

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 10 March 2009

Reference number: AKR 241/2008

Brief Summary: The Equality Body investigated a complaint received from an NGO regarding the attack against a Cypriot black female pupil by a group of about 40 other Cypriot white pupils following a volleyball match between her school and another school. The attack took place in December 2008 when the victim tried to defend one of her co-players in the match and was then attacked by pupils of the other school shouting racist insults. The victim was severely injured and had to be taken to hospital.

⁷⁹ C-411/05, dated 16.10.2007.

When the police arrived on the scene, the school headmaster informed them that the matter would be handled internally between the two schools. No arrests were made and no charges were brought against anyone by the time of issue of the Equality Body's report, three months after the incident. The police who initially refused to accept a statement from the victim's father, subsequently agreed to do so following the Equality Body's intervention. A statement issued later by the school's teachers rejected the allegations of racist motives and described the incident as the manifestation of youth delinquency. The only measure taken by the school was to permanently expel one pupil who initiated the attack against the victim but cited as reasons for the expulsion her involvement in the incident and her shouting insults against the teachers; the school's decision made no mention of racist behaviour. In contrast, the Minister of Education unequivocally described the incident as racist and committed himself to the setting up of a monitoring mechanism for the recording and analysis of violent incidents maintaining a special record for racist incidents. The Equality Body criticised the school authorities for refusing to attribute racist motive to the attack and for stressing the allegedly provocative behaviour of the victim, in an apparent effort to shift responsibility from the assailants to the victim.

The report also criticised the decision of the school to permanently expel one of the assailants stating that this measure is not only inadequate in that it failed to address the racist motive of the pupil but it was also lacking educational sensitivity, as the repercussions from the permanent expulsion are likely to intensify the problem. The Equality Body also criticized the attitude of the police who failed to take an active stand against racism in spite of the victim's unequivocal position that she wanted the case to go to Court, and stated that the lack of commitment of the police against racism will lead not only to the intensification of the phenomenon but also to the vulnerable groups losing faith in the police. The report welcomes the stand of the Minister of Education who consistently described the incident as racist and visited the schools as well as the victim in order to show his solidarity and concern.

After emphasising once more⁸⁰ the inadequacy of the system of recording racist incidents maintained by the police who clearly make an underestimation of the problem, the report refers to decisions of the ECtHR⁸¹ and to ECRI recommendations on recording racist incidents on the one hand⁸² and on anti-racist education on the other hand.⁸³ The report concluded that as long as educationalists do not take an active stand against racism and prefer the oversimplified interpretation of youth delinquency and as long as incidents are not addressed and handled and assailants go unpunished, the phenomenon of racist violence will be reproduced and multiplied.

⁸⁰ Similar comments were made by the Equality Body in previous reports: Ref. AKR 37/2005, dated 11.07.2005; Ref. AKR 7/2006, dated 01.08.2007; and Ref. AKR/AYT 2/2008, dated 26.01.2009.

⁸² ECRI General Policy Recommendation No 11 on combating racism and racial discrimination in policing.

⁸³ ECRI General Policy Recommendation No 10 dated 15 December 2006.

The problem becomes more serious when the victims are migrant children who form a particularly vulnerable group and even more so when they were born or raised in Cyprus or acquired Cypriot nationality as there are serious issues of integration of second generation Cypriots posed and racist incidents must be faced decidedly in order to reinstate their feelings of security and social acceptance.

Equality Body criticizes the reluctance of the police to implement anti-racist legislation

Name of the body: Equality body

Date of decision: 26 January 2009

Reference number: AKP/AYT 2/2008

Brief summary: The Equality Body carried out a self-initiated investigation into the handling by the police of a group attack against migrants which was reported in the press and which was manifestly racial. The attack took place in June 2008 in a rural area and most of the perpetrators were aged between 14-18; the victims were persons of migrant origin who fled without reporting the incident to the police.

The incident was reported to the police by a number of British persons who rushed to the rescue of the migrants and who were attacked themselves by the youth, whose number had meanwhile grown and who equipped themselves with stones and iron bars, causing considerable damage to homes of migrants and to the property of the British people who run to their rescue, shouting racial remarks and injuring several of them. The perpetrators were charged with offences related to common assault, malicious damage to property and riot, which do not involve racial motive.

The Equality Body's investigation showed that the Police Department for the Combating of Discrimination (PDCD) whose mandate was extended on 11.02.2008 following the Equality Body's recommendation, to cover and record not only racial offences but also racial incidents (as defined inter alia by the victim), does not have any mechanism in place to record racial incidents; only a small number of racial offences were recorded⁸⁴ none of which led to any conviction. This is, according to the Equality Body, evident of the role of the police in handing the investigation and the criminal procedure. It also emerged from the investigation that the system of recording racial offences is such that, unless the investigating officer chooses to classify an offence as racial, the PDCD is not informed of the incident at all. The head of the PDCD admitted that no special training is offered to police officers on the identification and recording of racial motive and expressed the view that the change of mentality within the police body will come gradually through experience. The limited activity of the PDCD was attributed to its serious under-staffing and its wide mandate which covers at the same time two more departments (violence in the family and youth delinquency).

⁸⁴ Two incidents were recorded in 2005, eighteen in 2006 and three in 2007.

The Head of the PDCD informed the Equality Body that in the particular case under investigation there did not seem to be a prima facie case of offences in violation of the anti-discrimination legislation, a view which was criticised in the report.

The Equality Body referred to the Second and Third ECRI reports on Cyprus of 03.07.2001 and 16.05.2006 respectively which noted that the legislative provisions relating to racism are not adequately implemented, that awareness of these laws is low amongst legal circles and the public at large, that the police is not adequately trained to identify and address racial motive, that racial crime is not adequately recorded and that the bodies involved in the criminal justice process are not adequately aware of the need to address racism. Reference was also made to the ECtHR decision in Bekou & Koutropoulou v. Greece where Greece was found guilty of not adequately addressing the racial motive involved in an attack against a group of Roma, as well as to the reports of the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights where the data collection carried out by Cyprus appears to be inadequate. The Equality Body concludes that the incident under investigation is not an isolated one and that there is an increase in the number and intensity of racial incidents. It notes that previous investigations have also shown the failure of the police to prosecute racial incidents, adding that although the legislative framework appears to be adequate, the authorities stubbornly refuse to prosecute racial incidents reported by victims or by NGOs or appearing in the media.

The report notes with concern the fact that in the incident under investigation the migrants attacked did not file a complaint with the police, which indicates that vulnerable groups feel discouraged from reporting racial incidents for fear of deportation or for lack of trust in the police. At the same time, the underreporting phenomenon shows a general failure of the existing system to record the real picture of racism in Cyprus.

The Equality Body recommends the following measures: the precise and credible recording of racial incidents; the provision of assistance and protection to victims and their encouragement to report incidents; the upgrading of the PDCD and its adequate staffing; the training of police officers on the identification and handling of racial incidents.

Below are some landmark Court decisions from 2007 and 2008 Turkish Cypriot judge is awarded lost salaries and pension

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Date of decision: 21 March 2007

Name of the parties: Ulfet Emin v. The Republic of Cyprus

Reference number: Case No. 1473/2005

Brief Summary: A Turkish Cypriot judge who in 1966 was forced by Greek-Cypriot police to abandon his post, applied to the Supreme Court under article 146 of the Constitution to set aside a decision of the Ministry of Finance rejecting his claim for lost salaries and/or pension. The applicant had been removed from his office by Greek Cypriot police at gunpoint and forced back into the Turkish-Cypriot enclave.

The Court found the Finance Ministry's decision unjustified and ruled that it should be set aside, because, inter alia, the applicant did not abandon his post out of his own free will but was forced to leave; and because decisions which restrict a person's rights for an indefinite amount of time, as is the case here, must be interpreted restrictively.

The Court's reasoning, that decisions limiting rights for an indefinite period of time must be interpreted restrictively, was not adopted in other court cases concerning Turkish Cypriots' access to their properties in the areas controlled by the Republic, reported below, where most judgments found that these properties would be administered by the "Custodian" (the Interior Minister) until resolution of the Cyprus problem.

Turkish Cypriot is not awarded his property in the Republic-controlled south of Cyprus

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Date of decision: 15 June 2007

Name of the parties: Kiamil Ali Riza v. The Republic of Cyprus

Reference number: case no.133/2005

Brief summary: A Turkish-Cypriot claimed his right to his property which, like all other Turkish-Cypriot properties, are deemed by law⁸⁵ to have been 'abandoned' when Turkish-Cypriots moved to the north between 1963-1974. In 1991 all Turkish Cypriot properties in the south were placed under the control of the 'Custodian' who is the Interior Minister.

The appellant argued that the Custodian law is unconstitutional and in violation of the equality principle and that the expropriation of his property which the government had carried out was illegal. The Court rejected his claim stating that the lifting of the ban on freedom of movement in 2003 did not mean that the property is 'no longer abandoned'; that the cessation of 'the abnormal situation' can only be decided by the Council of Ministers and that, due to the 1974 war, the state legitimately invoked emergency measures relying on the 'doctrine of necessity'.

The decision contradicts the principle established by the ECtHR in the case of Aziz⁸⁶ where the ECtHR ruled that the doctrine of necessity cannot override fundamental rights.

⁸⁵ Law on Turkish Cypriot Properties (Administration and other matters) (Temporary Provisions) of 1991 N.139/91

⁸⁶ The case is discussed in detail in the Cyprus Country Report of the European Network of Legal Experts in the non-discrimination field (state of affairs up to 08.01.2007) available at http://ec.europa.eu/employment_social/fundamental_rights/pdf/legnet/cyrep07_en.pdf. The full text of the decision is available at <http://www.echr.coe.int/Eng/Press/2004/June/ChamberJudgmentAzizvCyprus220604.htm>

The decision also appears to be reversing the reasoning of the 2004 decision in Arif Mustafa v. The Interior Minister (Case no.125/2004)⁸⁷ where it was established that the purpose of the custodian law was to protect the properties in the owner's absence and not to retaliate against the occupation of Greek-Cypriot properties in the north, which would constitute a violation of Article 6 of the Constitution prohibiting discrimination on the ground of belonging to one of the two communities.

During 2007 there were several court decisions following the line adopted in Kiamil Ali Riza v. The Republic of Cyprus rather than the line of Arif Mustafa v. The Interior Minister. In Zehra Kemal Ahmet and Nuray Kemal Ahmet v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Interior Minister as Custodian of Turkish Cypriot Properties,⁸⁸ for instance, the Court rejected the applicant's claim that she did not fall within the scope of the Custodian law because she did not leave her house out of her own free will. Instead, the Court ruled that the custodian law was inter alia founded on the need to meet the housing needs of Greek Cypriot people displaced as a result of the Turkish invasion of 1974 and that this measure was "absolutely necessary and proportionate to the situation that had to be addressed" meaning the situation created by the Turkish invasion.

This reasoning contradicts the judge's reasoning in Arif Mustafa where it was established that the Custodian law cannot be used to retaliate to the occupation of Greek-Cypriot properties in the north, which would constitute violation of Article 6 of the Constitution, prohibiting discrimination on the ground of belonging to one or the other community.⁸⁹

Third country national loses right to unpaid salaries and compensation because he worked without work permit

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Date of decision: 20 June 2007

Name of the parties:

Gary Wayne White v. Athletic Association Kition (AEK) Larnaca et al

Reference number: Case No. 49/2006

⁸⁸ 21.05.2007, Supreme Court Case No. 1011/2004.

⁸⁹ Overall, Turkish Cypriots have filed a total of 57 court cases, eight of them during 2009, to reclaim property located in the government-controlled area, and the Supreme Court issued judgments in two cases concerning Turkish Cypriot properties that are under the guardianship of the Ministry of Interior. According to the law, these types of properties cannot be returned unless the owners resettle permanently in the government-controlled area. In one case the Supreme Court ruled in favour of the applicant and declared null and void a decision by the guardian to turn down the owner's request for restitution of his property. In the second case, the Supreme Court upheld the decision of the guardian rejecting the owner's request for restitution (Source: U.S. State Department Report on Human Rights Practices: Cyprus, released on 11/03.2010, available at <http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2009/eur/136026.htm>)

Brief Summary: The applicant, a third country national, sued his employer for payment of unpaid salaries and compensation due to him for unlawful dismissal. The employer argued that although the amount claimed by the applicant was indeed due, the applicant was not entitled to it because at the time of rendering the services in question he was working without a work permit. Subsequently, the applicant secured a work permit as well as Cypriot nationality. The judge found in favour of the employer because the agreement for the applicant's employment without a work permit was deemed illegal and void ab initio; and that the test in order to decide if this contract is enforceable or not is whether the agreement is contrary to public order.

The Court found that the need to protect the state and its citizen is absolute and that the employment of a foreigner without permit is a serious criminal offence which harms the public interest. Therefore the applicant's claim for the payment of salaries and compensation due to him failed. Although not mentioned in the decision, the case under examination is arguably a case of indirect discrimination on the ground of national origin (a protected ground according to Cypriot law as far as the mandate of the equality body is concerned), given the fact that it concerns a practice that is prima facie neutral but results in a disadvantage to foreign workers, who are essentially punished by depriving them of their rights under the contract and by allowing employers to evade their obligations towards the employee. The practice confirmed by this decision, in other words the loss of salaries when there is no valid work permit, is clearly targeting third country nationals, since they are the only ones requiring a work permit in order to be allowed to work.

Different retirement age for employees of different ages does not violate the anti-discrimination Directives

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Date of decision: 01 June 2007

Name of the parties: Vasos Constantinou v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Public Service Commission; Androula Stavrou v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Public Service Commission

Reference number: Case Nos 1795/2006 and 1705/2006 (the two applications were tried together)

Brief summary: The applicants applied to the court regarding the Pensions Law of 1967 (N.9/67) which fixed the retirement age for all public servants at the age of 60, as amended by Law N.69(1)/2005, article 4A of which fixed retirement age as follows:

- The age of 63 for those who attain the age of 60 on or after 01.07.2008
- The age of 62 for those who attain the age of 60 between 01.01.2007-30.06.2008.
- The age of 61 for those who attain the age of 60 between 01.07.2005-31.12.2006.

Both applicants fell under the latter category and had received notice that they must retire on 1.2.2007 and 1.1.2007 respectively. The applicants argued that the provisions of the aforesaid law create a disadvantage for them based on their age, in violation of article 28 of the Cypriot Constitution and of laws 42(I)/2004 and 58(I)/2004 which transpose the Employment Equality Directive and that they should also be able to retire at 63.

The applicants argued that they do not seek to declare the aforesaid law unconstitutional, as that would have the effect of reverting to the law of 1967 before the 2005 amendment; in that case the retirement age would be 60 for everyone. Their application sought to sever only those provisos of the law which differentiate between persons attaining the age of 60 at different periods (set out in bullets above) to the effect that the retirement age of 63 is applicable to all irrespective of age. With reference to the applicability of the EU anti-discrimination acquis, Counsel for the Republic argued that the directly relevant acquis provision is the Employment Equality Directive which expressly excludes from its scope the setting of the age of retirement, leaving it to be regulated by the national governments. The Court decided that it did not have the power to extend any legislative provision, nor to change it to the extent that it would essentially amount to a new law, as this can only be done by the legislative branch of the state. It therefore rejected the applicants' appeal but made no order as to costs, because the applicants' had brought before them a serious matter of general public interest.

The Supreme Court rejects application for referral to CJEU for interpretation of Racial Equality Directive.

Name of the court: Supreme Court of Cyprus

Date of decision: 17 December 2007

Name of the parties: Perihan Mustafa Korkut or Eyiam Perihan v. Apostolos Georgiou through his attorney Charalambos Zoppos

Reference number: Case No. 303/2006

Brief summary: The appellant was a Turkish Cypriot who owned property, filed an ex tempore application asking for a referral to the CJEU of the question whether article 2 of the Racial Equality Directive could be interpreted in a manner permitting an EU member state to deny the lawful owner of a property the right to sell it. The application was rejected on the ground of abuse of process (the appellant had filed and withdrawn two similar applications in 2005 and 2007 respectively) and also because the Court found that the scope of the Directive did not include the issue at stake, which was access to property. In describing the scope of the Directive, the Court mentioned only 'conditions for access to employment, working conditions, social protection including social security and social advantages'.

Labour tribunal claims lack of jurisdiction to try a complaint for age discrimination in a job advertisement

Name of the court: Limassol Labour Tribunal

Date of decision: 30 July 2008

Name of the parties: Avgoustina Hadjiavraam v. The Cooperative Credit Company of Morphou

Reference number: Case No. 258/05

Brief summary: An applicant for a position in a credit institution sued the latter after her application was turned down, claiming that she was rejected because of her age.

The job advertisement for this position contained a maximum age limit but the credit institution argued that she was turned down not because of her age but because of her qualifications. At the same time, the credit institution defended the age limit in the advertisement, arguing that this was appropriate, reasonable and serving a legitimate aim, because they intended to train and retrain the persons to be hired and they should have time ahead of them to progress and climb to higher positions in the credit institution, as they do not want to have “old people” in junior positions. Based on the testimony delivered before it, the Tribunal rejected the respondents’ argument that the applicant’s age was not taken into consideration and found that the fact that the applicant had fewer qualifications did not preclude the conclusion that she was not a victim of age discrimination. The Tribunal also ruled that it was not necessary for age to be the sole reason in order for discrimination to exist; it suffices that age was a contributory cause of the treatment with significant impact on it.

Under the circumstances, a prima facie case of discrimination was established and the burden of proof shifted to the respondents to rebut the presumption. The testimony showed that the respondents did consider age as an important factor, hence the age restriction in the advertisement and their statement that they did not want to have “old people” in junior positions. In its decision, the Tribunal found that there was unlawful discrimination on the ground of age in the hiring procedure and decided the sum of 1500 Euros to be adequate damages, based on an CJEU decision⁹⁰ which established that the measure of damages of three monthly salaries satisfied the test of essential protection, deterrence and proportionality for those job candidates who would not have been hired even in the absence of the age discrimination. It ought to be noted that the amount of compensation requested by the claimant included lost salaries had she been hired and worked at the advertised post since this was announced in the press, which amounted to 288,257 Cyprus Pounds (492,578 Euros).

At the same time, however, the Tribunal ruled that it could not award any amount of compensation to the applicant because it lacked jurisdiction to decide on this dispute, since there was no employer-employee relationship between the parties.

The claimant has already filed an appeal against this decision on the issue of jurisdiction, as well as on the ground that the compensation awarded does not provide adequate deterrent.

Court rejects claim of Turkish Cypriots for student grant because of their residence in the northern part of Cyprus

Date of decision: 08 August 2008

Name of the parties: Fatma Igdir and Nalan Igdir v. Ministry of Finance through the Service of Grants and Benefits

Reference number: Case No. 2410/2006

Brief summary: The applicants who are mother and daughter applied to the Supreme Court in order to set aside the decision of the Ministry of Finance to reject their application for a student grant for the daughter who attends a school of arts in the Republic-controlled south of Cyprus. The Court rejected their application. The Ministry's decision was based on Law on the Provision of Special Grants N. 77(I)/96 which sets as a precondition for the grant that the student be a resident of the Republic controlled part of Cyprus. The applicants claimed that the said precondition violates the principle of equality established by article 28 of the Constitution. The Supreme Court decided that it did not have the power to change the law or to sever the provision which according to the applicants contained discrimination. This decision follows previous Court decisions, as well as equality body decisions, which confirm laws and regulations excluding Turkish Cypriots from public benefits by reason of their residence in the north. No mention was made either by the applicants' lawyers or by the Court to law 59(I)/2004 transposing the Racial Equality Directive and to the obligation contained therein to revise any discriminatory provisions contained in laws. The decision is yet another manifestation of the low awareness of the anti-discrimination acquis amongst legal circles in Cyprus.

Below are some landmark decisions of the equality body / ombudsman in 2007 and 2008:

The fixing of age limit in state scholarships is found to be discriminatory

Name of the court: Equality body

Reference number: Ref. A.K.I. 50/2006

Brief Summary: Two complaints were submitted to the Equality body (on 13.9.2006 and on 6.3.2007) alleging that the age limits of 25 and 40 set by the State Foundation of Scholarships (SFS) for graduate and postgraduate studies respectively were unlawful. A report to that effect had previously been submitted by the Equality body to the SFS on 5.8.2005 recommending the removal of the age limits, which however had not been complied with. The argument put by SFS to justify the age limits was that the state invests these funds intending the utilisation of knowledge for the maximum possible period of time.

The Equality body's investigation however found that the only obligation imposed on some of the receivers of the scholarships was to return to Cyprus to work for at least two years and even that was not strictly adhered to. The Attorney General, who was asked by SFS to advice on the matter, found that the age limits did not violate the constitutional equality provision (Article 28) and could even comply with the Employment Directive provided it is justified by a legitimate aim.

The equality body found that the age limits set by SFS amount to (a) direct discrimination on the ground of age that cannot be justified by the exception provided in the Employment Directive (b) potentially indirect discrimination on the ground of (i) social class, as it affected more adversely persons who for financial reasons are forced to delay their studies or who have to resort to state scholarships as the only means for them to study, as well as on the ground of (ii) sex, because it is women who are more often delaying their education due to increased family and social obligations.

In response to SFS' argument about the existence of a legitimate aim (in this case, the alleged utilisation of knowledge for the maximum possible period) the report found that on its own this cannot justify discriminatory treatment and that the SFS should additionally prove that: there was no alternative criterion, less discriminatory, for the attainment of the legitimate aim; the criterion used is effective; and the benefits significantly outweigh the disadvantages caused by the implementation of the criterion in question.

Using the powers granted to it by article 39(1) of the Combating of Racial and other forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law N. 42(I)/2004 the equality body has referred the relevant provision to the Attorney General for amendment but no action was taken so far. The equality body had initially recommended the cancellation of the age limit in scholarships in 2005; however an opinion delivered by the Attorney General subsequent to that was that the age limits are not discriminatory. The House of Representatives examined both positions and decided merely to increase the age limit for postgraduate studies from 35 to 40.

Equality body rules that the case of Jean Mistrellides⁹¹ had been mishandled by the police

Name of the court: Equality body (Anti-Discrimination Authority)⁹²

Date of decision: 01 August 2007

Brief Summary: On 20 January 2006 the District Court of Nicosia found Jean Mistrellides (JM), a Cypriot of African descent, guilty of assaulting a group of youth.

⁹² The Anti-discrimination authority is one of the two offices comprising the Equality body in Cyprus. It handles mostly complaints deriving from the Racial Equality Directive.

The youth had systematically been demonstrating aggressively racist and threatening behaviour towards JM for which JM had repeatedly complained to the police who failed to prosecute the youth or offer any protection to JM and his family. In 2003 JM chased the youth away in a manner which caused one of them to lose his balance and fall from his motorbike, sustaining minor injuries; the youth complained to the police who pressed charges against JM but not against the youth. In Court, JM pleaded guilty to the charges and was fined.

NGO Symfiliosi filed a complaint to the Equality body against the police for failing to prosecute the youth for their systematic racist behaviour, claiming discrimination in access to police protection on the ground of race/ethnic origin.

In its decision the equality body noted the police's allegations, that JM never officially filed a complaint to the police and that when the police invited him to do so, he declined stating that he does not trust the police. The report nevertheless found that the police was obliged to examine the case on its own initiative, bearing in mind that victims often fear reprisals and may thus be frightened to file complaints. Moreover, the Report noted that the police failed to protect JM or take measures to prevent the crime and to combat the racial harassment. Special mention is made of the discrepancies in the recording of racial incidents by the police and of the fact that the data kept by the police do not reveal the true extent of the situation in Cyprus regarding racism.

The report also deplored the practice of the police to publicise figures about crimes committed by migrants, but never about crimes committed against migrants, which leads to feelings of insecurity, xenophobia and racism amongst the host population.

The report calls on the police to consider anew the incident and take all measures necessary to protect the victim and prosecute the racist youth even at this late stage. Finally the Report contains a number of recommendations on how to deal with racial incidents in the future based on the ECRI and EU recommendations. The report's recommendations were not taken up by the police who did not proceed to prosecute the youth. Instead, the police invited JM to visit the police station in order to give a written statement but he declined saying that he does not trust the police. The equality body did not take any further action after that.

Legislative provision permitting the dismissal of employees without compensation after attaining the age of 65 is found discriminatory

Name of the court: Equality body

Date of decision: 11 April 2007

Reference number: A.K.I. 13/2005

Brief Summary: On 4 March 2005 a complaint was submitted to the Equality body, alleging that article 4 of the Termination of Employment Law which entitles employers to dismiss employees aged 65 or over without compensation, amounts to discrimination on the ground of age, in violation of article 8(1) of the Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation Law N.58(I)/2004 (transposing the Employment Equality Directive).

The Ministry of Labour argued, instead, that this measure encourages employers to keep employees at work after they attain retirement age and that the protection of the majority of persons of 65 plus is secured through their pension and provident fund benefits. The equality body found that mere invocation of Directive article 6 is not sufficient but the legitimate aim must be sufficiently explained from which the necessity of the differential treatment as the necessary means of achieving this aim must emerge clearly.

The decision recognises that there are persons over 65 in Cyprus, no matter how few, who do not receive any pension at all or who receive a reduced amount. The decision was also referred to the Attorney General in order for him to prepare the amending law to rectify this problem.

At the time of writing, the Equality Body's decision had not been complied with and article 4 of the Termination of Employment Law remained in force.

Employers' duty to provide reasonable accommodation for employees with disability.

Date of decision: 12 June 2007

Brief Summary: A blind person employed at a state hospital complained to the equality body that his access to the workplace was obstructed/inconvenienced by the fact that he did not have the key to the front door of the hospital⁹³ and had to use the back door, the way to which was often obstructed by boxes; and the parking lot allocated to him was not protected with a chain, as a result of which it was often occupied by visitors or suppliers.

During the Equality body's investigations, the former problem was remedied to the satisfaction of the complainant, as the efforts of the hospital management to supervise the access area to the back door and ensure that no obstacles obstructed clear access to the back door, were successful. But the parking problem persisted.

⁹³ The complainant had been issued electronic keys to the front door but lost them as a result of his disability. The hospital management stated that there were no more keys to be made available to him because the system was quite old and no new keys could be issued. Instead, they supplied him with keys to the back door.

Quoting the 2007 amendments to the disability law which rendered the obligation to provide reasonable accommodation more absolute than in the previous law,⁹⁴ the equality body found that the provision of reasonable accommodation is not only necessary for the effective implementation of the prohibition of discrimination, but it is also a specific legal obligation of the employer, adding that the principle of equal treatment does not prevent the more favourable treatment of persons with disability in employment in order to preserve their labour integration.

The report found that the employer responded satisfactorily to the complaint of access to the back door of the hospital (by ensuring that the access to the door remains unobstructed at all times) but not to the issue of the parking lot, where the employer had an obligation either to indicate and suitably adapt an alternative space or to supervise the parking area sufficiently.

Equality body decision on complaint for discrimination against persons with disability in access to jobs in the public sector due to lack of reasonable accommodation measures

Name of the court: Equality body

Date of decision: 08 October 2008

Reference number: A.K.I. 37/2008

Brief Summary: A complainant who suffered from visual impairment limiting his vision to 1/10, took an exam for appointment in the civil service and was awarded the mark of 55,56/100. Prior to the exam, he had requested certain facilities due to his reduced vision and, in particular, 50% additional time, the use of laptop for the English section of the exam and permit to dictate to another for the Greek section of the exam as he did not know Braille and he was not fast on Greek typing because he had lived abroad for many years.

The Special Committee granted his request for the use of laptop and the services of a transcriber but allowed him only 30 minutes extra exam time, following the example of examinations for admission to secondary and tertiary education, in respect of which there is a policy in place for granting 30 minutes extra examination time to persons with disabilities. The complainant subsequently submitted a complaint to the Equality body arguing that the policy of comparing his performance at the exam with the performance of persons without disability amounts to discrimination. Upon investigation by the Equality body, it emerged that the extra 30 minutes granted were taken from the break that all persons taking the exam are entitled to, as the duration of the exam is 6,5 hours, which in essence neutralises the advantage of the extra 30 minutes granted.

⁹⁴ Law on Persons with Disability N. 127(I)/2000, as amended by Law N. 57(I)/2004 and N. 72(I)/2007.

The report notes that, whilst in the case of exams for admission to secondary and tertiary education there is a procedure in place for looking upon each case separately in order to decide what reasonable accommodation measures must be granted for persons with disabilities because, depending on the degree of disability, the extra time may have to exceed 30 minutes, there is no such procedure in the case of exams for appointment in the public service. The report further states that the principle of reasonable accommodation is founded upon the premise that the measure must ensure equality in opportunity and not in the result.

The report concludes that the measures granted to the complainant were not sufficient in order to create conditions of true equality for him to compete with the other candidates and recommends that the law on Assessment of Candidates for Appointment in the Public Service be amended so as to provide for reasonable accommodation for candidates with a disability and for a procedure whereby the decision on the reasonable accommodation measures to be granted in each case must be made by a team of experts.

Furthermore, the Equality body recommends that until the law is amended so as to reflect the above, the decision on measures to be granted to candidates with disabilities must be made after consultation with the Cypriot Confederation of Organisations of Disabled Persons (KYSOA), in accordance with Law on Consultation Process of State and Other Services in Matters Concerning Persons With Disabilities of 2006.

Equality body report on age discrimination in the field of insurance services

Name of the court: Equality body

Reference number: 125/2007

Brief Summary: The chair of the Social Welfare Committee of the Parliament of the Elderly submitted a complaint to the Equality body against the practice or policy of insurance companies of refusing to insure persons over 70 years old for driving a car, or of imposing higher premiums for such contracts.

The complaint was supported by statistical evidence supplied by the police in relation to car accidents, according to which elderly persons are less likely to have car accidents in comparison with other age groups. The Equality body consulted the Association of Insurance Companies who claimed that there is no standard policy followed by all insurance companies and that each company forms its own policy, adding that the said statistical evidence on its own is not indicative of the size of the risk since they are not combined with other risk-determining evidence such as the number of licensed drivers per age group, the frequency and seriousness of the accidents etc.

The Equality body Report noted that, although at European Community level there is no legislation yet at hand prohibiting age discrimination in the field of goods and services as such, there are a number of factors demonstrating the will of the EC to combat age discrimination in all fields, such as: article 13 of the Treaty of the European Communities; article 21(1) of the yet to be adopted Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Commission; and the Proposal for a Council Directive on equal treatment between persons irrespective of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation COM(2008) 426 which purports to extend the principle of non-discrimination to provision and access to goods and services commercially available to the public. In particular, the Proposal contains a special rule for insurance services allowing insurers to take age and disability into account in the assessment of risk, which however must be based on accurate data and statistics (paragraph 2).

At national level, the relevant factors to be considered are: the fact that the regulations issued by the Council of Ministers in 1995 setting higher maximum insurance premiums by 25% for drivers under 25 and over 70 have been cancelled; the Driving License Laws of 2001-2004 provide for the issuing of driving license to persons over 70 every three years provided they submit a medical certificate that they fulfil a certain minimum physical and mental ability level; the Combating of Racial and Other Forms of Discrimination Law N. 42(I)/2004 (which appoints the Ombudsman as the national equality body) provides for wide powers to submit recommendations, issue orders and impose fines in all fields and on all five grounds including age, in the public as well as in the private sector (article 6); article 28 of the Cypriot Constitution prohibits discrimination on all grounds not only vis-à-vis the state but also against persons in the private sector. The report concludes that, although access to goods and services is not yet regulated by national or EU law, the wider institutional framework covers all forms of age discrimination and imposes a legal obligation on insurers to justify any differential treatment objectively and convincingly. It then concludes that the practice or policy complained of, unsupported by reliable statistical evidence, is not reasonably and objectively justified.

The conclusion was based on the following three facts: (a) in a country like Cyprus with such a poor public transport network, driving a car is significant for a person's ability to be an active member of society; (b) the law does not preclude persons over 70 from possessing a driving license; (c) the fact that insurance cover is obligatory for all vehicles which distinguishes the particular insurance services from other services of the private sector which are optional. However, given that the complaint was not directed against any particular insurance company, the Equality body did not take any action other than to advise insurance companies to revise their policies in order to be in line with the provisions of the new directive, to come into force soon, prohibiting age discrimination in the field of provision of services.

Age criteria in public benefit schemes for persons with disabilities

Date of decision: 10 November 2008

Reference number: 114/2007.

Brief Summary: A complaint was submitted to the Equality body from a person with a disability against the Department for the Welfare of the Disabled of the Ministry of Labour for rejecting her application for benefit under a scheme for the provision of benefit to persons with severe disability in movement, which contained age restrictions. In particular, the said scheme provides for the payment of benefit to persons with the aforesaid type of disability provided they are over 12 and less than 65 years of age, unless they received disability benefit prior to the introduction of this scheme.

The Department tried to justify the age restriction as an attempt to limit the cost of the scheme for the state, stating that the age of 65 was selected because persons who acquire a disability prior to attaining 65 have less of a chance to pay satisfactory contributions to the state Social Insurance Fund due to their disability, which means that they will not be entitled to sufficient benefits from the Social Insurance fund after they attain 65. The Equality body found that the age restrictions introduced unequal treatment of equal things, which amounts to discrimination, adding that this cannot be justified by the volume of the costs involved.

In response to the argument of the Department for the Welfare of the Disabled that persons who acquired a disability before 65 have more need of the benefit because of their reduced social insurance entitlement, the report found this inconsistent with the provision of the scheme that the benefit is granted independently of the financial situation of the applicant. The Equality body invited to consultation all interested parties, including representatives of the Labour Ministry, the Finance Ministry and the Confederation of Organisations of Persons with Disabilities, which was recently afforded the status of a social partner.

Given that the scope of the law transposing Directive 78/2000/EC (Law N. 58(I)/2004) does not include social advantage, the Equality body made use of the general anti-discrimination principle found in the Cypriot Constitution, which does not explicitly cover age as one of the prohibited grounds but prohibits discrimination "on any other ground". The decision follows a previous decision (ref. 58/2007, dated 19.06.2007) whereby another scheme which introduced differential treatment of persons with tetraplegia depending on the generic source of their tetraplegia.

In that case, the consultation held by the Equality body has led the department concerned to revise the scheme and remove the restriction. At the time of writing, the process of consultation had not as yet been completed. If this consultation process also leads to a revision of the scheme by removing the age restriction, then the Equality body will have achieved results once again by mediation without having to resort to the imposition of fines, a measure generally avoided by the Equality body as counter-productive, given the low amount of fines foreseen by the law.

Equality body report on complaints against the Ministry of Education for its failure to address racism in public schools

Name of the court: Equality body

Date of decision: 22 October 2008

Reference number: AKP 88/2008.

Brief Summary: Two complaints were submitted to the Equality body against the Ministry of Education for its handling of racism at schools.

One complaint alleged that the practice of covering up and/or ignoring repeated incidents of racist vandalisms and racist graffiti on the walls of school buildings has created a negative and threatening climate for the vulnerable groups at school who see racist incidents not being dealt with decisively.

The second complaint concerned an incident involving a 13-year-old female migrant pupil who was intimidated and humiliated by the racist bullying from her classmates, as a result of which she stopped attending classes, preferring instead, for much of the school year, to stay in the school yard. In response to the first complaint, the school denied the allegations, arguing that the graffiti on the school building concerned football. Regarding the second complaint, the school authorities confirmed that the student in question was racially verbally abused but refused to acknowledge that she was intimidated, because she failed to name her assailants. The school decided to treat the matter as closed without taking any action whatsoever. A document issued by the Head of Educational Psychology Service of the Education Ministry claimed that whilst racial discrimination and racist behaviour are deplorable, such issues must avoid over exposure in the media as this creates a negative image for youth and for the school and embodies the risk that the phenomenon will spread as "psychosocially vulnerable persons are at risk of copying action which is self-destructive or destructive of others when they know that they will be glorified as heroes through exaggeration."

In its report the Equality body found that although the particular racist incidents complained of do not constitute the rule amongst student population, they definitely contain the element of racism which must be immediately addressed by the teaching community and the Education Ministry; any efforts to cover up or downgrade the significance of such events or failure to record them as such amounts to a short-sighted handling of the phenomenon which disempowers victims.

The Equality body also found that the school gave disproportionately high emphasis to the danger of leakage to the media rather than taking decisive measures to combat racism. Regarding the manner in which the victim of the incident was treated by the school authorities, the Equality body stated that it is well-known that victims who are in a vulnerable position would rather not name their assailants, for fear of their safety or in an effort to integrate.

The report refers to further incidents of manifestly racist behaviour at schools such as the throwing of stones at a migrant worker, which the school also decided to treat as a regular incident of youth delinquency rather than admit its racist nature, criticising the school's approach and stating that the admission of the existence of racist incidents is the first step towards developing mechanisms for their prevention.

The Equality body referred to the 2007 Report of European Union Agency Fundamental Rights, which notes the failure of Cyprus to adequately record racial incidents in education, recommending the adoption of the ECRI 10th and the 11th

Recommendation⁹⁶ which provides that a racial incident is any incident that is so defined by the victim. The Equality body recommendations towards the Education Ministry include the following:

(a) Decisive measures to combat racism in all cases under investigation, including dissuasive sanctions against perpetrators. It proposes the setting up of a specialised mechanism to evaluate allegations and a system of recording and monitoring of racial incidents. (b) The adoption of comprehensive measures to combat racism, xenophobia, discrimination and nationalism, in the framework of the new intercultural educational policy, with a program of interactive anti-racist education and training.

This decision comes in the midst of heated political debates regarding nationalism and racism within the education system and the implementation of a comprehensive educational reform, following an additional number of racist attacks against migrant pupils at schools. At a press conference on 30.10.2008, the Ministry of Education announced that it endorses the recommendations of the Equality body in this case, although no particular measures had been taken up until the date of writing. In December 2008 another racist incident at a school, whereby a group of 40 pupils attacked a black pupil inflicting severe injuries was at the centre of political public debates. In that case, although the Ministry of Education acknowledged instantly the racist nature of the incident and promised measures, the teachers refused to attribute racist motive to the attack and instead emphasized the allegedly provocative behaviour of the victim. The teachers' attitude was criticised by the Equality body in its report that followed the attack.⁹⁷

Generally, decisions and recommendations by the Equality body are complied with by the authorities at an approximate rate of 60%, as stated by the Equality body.⁹⁸ However, there is at least one example where the Council of Ministers, the highest executive body, reversed and refused to comply with the Equality body's decision.

The said decision had found that a school regulation requiring foreign public to declare upon enrolment the contact details of their parents in order for the migration department to ascertain the legality of their stay in Cyprus was unlawful and asked for its withdrawal. The Council of Ministers retained the regulation alleging sovereign state rights to protect national security.⁹⁹

1 GENERAL LEGAL FRAMEWORK

Constitutional provisions on protection against discrimination and the promotion of equality

- a) Briefly specify the grounds covered (explicitly and implicitly) and the material scope of the relevant provisions. Do they apply to all areas covered by the Directives? Are they broader than the material scope of the Directives?

Article 28(1) of the Cyprus Constitution states: “All persons are equal before the law, the administration and justice, and are entitled to equal protection thereof and treatment thereby.”

Article 28(2) of the Cypriot Constitution guarantees the enjoyment of economic, social and cultural rights by all persons without any discrimination and provides that every person shall enjoy all the rights and liberties provided for in the Constitution without any direct or indirect discrimination against any person on the grounds of: community; race; religion; language; sex; political or other conviction; national or social descent; birth; colour; wealth; social class; or any ground whatsoever, unless the Constitution itself otherwise provides. Therefore this provision has a more far-reaching application than the anti-discrimination Directives.

Prior to the anti-discrimination laws of 2004 that transposed the acquis, the grounds of age, disability or sexual orientation were not expressly prohibited under this provision. The notion of ‘ethnic origin’ was integrated into the notion of ‘race’; the term ‘ethnicity’ was very recently introduced in Cyprus law. Article 28 of the Cyprus Constitution corresponds to Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and hence the whole corpus of the case law of the ECHR is relevant (see Nedjati 1972: 166-167). However, Article 28 is not dependent on any other right granted (Loizou 2001: 173). In any case, the ECHR was integrated into national law in 1962 (by Law N. 38/1962)¹⁰⁰. All the human rights Articles contained in the Cyprus Constitution under Part II (Articles 6-35) as well as rights conferred by the ECHR must be exercised in a non-discriminatory manner.

Part II of the Constitution sets out the “Fundamental Rights and Liberties”, incorporating verbatim and in some instances expanding upon the rights and liberties safeguarded by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

The Fundamental Rights and Liberties of Part II of the Constitution are expressly guaranteed to “everyone” or to “all persons” or to “every person”, with no distinction or differentiation between citizens and non-citizens of the Republic, or between citizens of the Republic who belong to the Greek or Turkish community and without any distinction or differentiation on the grounds of community or religion or nationality, or on other grounds. Article 6 provides that no law or decision of the House of Representatives or of any of the Communal Chambers (no longer active), and no act or decision of any organ, authority or person in the Republic exercising executive power or administrative functions, shall discriminate against any of the two “Communities”) or any person by virtue of being a member of a “Community”.¹⁰¹

Article 30 of Part II of the Constitution guarantees the right of access to the Courts as one of the fundamental rights and liberties. This is afforded to everyone, non-citizens and citizens alike and irrespective of which community or religious group they belong to, i.e. irrespective of whether s/he is Greek-Cypriot, Turkish-Cypriot, Maronite, Armenian or Latin.

Article 109 of the Constitution provides that each religious group has the right to be represented in the Communal Chamber by the elected members of the group, to which it opted to belong under Article 2.3 of the Constitution.¹⁰²

In July 2006, the Cypriot Constitution was amended to give supremacy to EU laws. All the rights provided for by the Constitution, which must be enforced without discrimination, including the principles Equality of Treatment and Non-discrimination (Article 28), are enforceable in the public and the private domain.¹⁰³ Administrative acts may also be challenged via judicial review under Article 146 of the Constitution.¹⁰⁴ The procedure of application to the Supreme Court is simple and fast albeit expensive: the legal aid law does not cover administrative proceedings.¹⁰⁵

¹⁰¹The term “Community” is used in the Constitution is meaning either the Greek or the Turkish Community of Cyprus.

¹⁰³ In the case of Yiallourou v. Evgenios Nicolaou, the court ruled that all rights guaranteed under the constitution are directly applicable in the public and private sphere: Supreme court, Appeal No. 9331, dated 08.05.2001

¹⁰⁴ Nedjati (1970: 96) cites the definition of ‘an administrative act’ provided by the first President of the Supreme Constitutional Court, Pro. E. Forsthoff Textbook on Administrative Law (8th Edition, 1961) as “all unilateral, authoritative acts of an authority of public, which have direct effect, with the exception of legislative and judicial acts”.

¹⁰⁵ Law on Provision of Legal Aid (2002) N. 165(I)/2002.

A ECtHR decision dated 04 December 2008 on the issue of availability of legal aid in administrative proceedings to an applicant who alleged sexual orientation discrimination, stated in the concurring opinion that “a question arises as to the conformity of such legislation with the requirements of Article 6 of the Convention” and that “there is a priori no reason why it should not be made available in spheres other than criminal law.”¹⁰⁶

b) Are constitutional anti-discrimination provisions directly applicable?

Although the Constitution itself is silent as to whether it is directly applicable or not, there is a Supreme Court decision of 2001 which ruled that all constitutional and other rights that are constitutionally guaranteed are directly and indirectly applicable in the private and public sectors.¹⁰⁷ Although the particular case did not involve any of the non-discrimination provisions of the Constitution,¹⁰⁸ the reasoning of the decision is phrased widely enough to cover all human rights enshrined in the Constitution. In particular, the Court found that Constitutional rights are actionable and their violation gives rise to remedies based on the principle of full restitution in the form of damages. From their nature, human rights violations and the provision of remedies fall within the competency of the courts and therefore no guarantee of rights is effective without the means for judicial protection with legal remedies. This is true especially for fundamental rights which, without such protection, would abort not only their fundamental character but their very nature as rights, amounting to mere proclamations of good conduct. Based on this reasoning, the Court rejected the respondent’s argument that the absence of a provision for judicial protection of fundamental rights renders these rights as “lex imperfecta”, as any violation of rights gives rise to judicial protection with remedies provided by the law of the country.

c) In particular, where a constitutional equality clause exists, can it (also) be enforced against private actors (as opposed to the State)?

The aforementioned Supreme Court decision in the case of Yiallourou v. Evgenios Nicolaou established that where there is a wrong there is a remedy and that any person whose human rights are violated can sue the state or private persons for damages, irrespective of whether an enforcement mechanism is specifically provided or not.

The decision opens the way for legal action against the state or private persons for discrimination, on the basis of Article 28 of the Constitution, which covers grounds not included in the laws transposing Directives 2000/78/EC and 2000/43/EC, such as community, language, national or social descent, birth, colour, wealth or “on any ground whatsoever (Art. 28.2). The resulting remedy from such action, which is just and reasonable compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage, is additional and of wider ambit than that of the laws transposing Directives 2000/78/EC and 2000/43/EC.

2 THE DEFINITION OF DISCRIMINATION

2.1 Grounds of unlawful discrimination

Which grounds of discrimination are explicitly prohibited in national law? All grounds covered by national law should be listed, including those not covered by the Directives.

All grounds referred to in the Directives¹⁰⁹ as well as those contained in Protocol 12 to the ECHR¹¹⁰ are explicitly prohibited grounds for discrimination in national law. The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law¹¹¹ appoints the Commissioner for Administration (or the Ombudsman), an independent officer, as the national equality body empowered to (i) combat racist and indirectly racist discrimination as well as discrimination forbidden by law and generally discrimination on the grounds of race, community, language, colour, religion, political or other beliefs and national or ethnic origin¹¹²; (ii) promote equality of the enjoyment of rights and freedoms safeguarded by the Cyprus Constitution (Part II) or by one or more of the Conventions ratified by Cyprus and referred to explicitly in the Law¹¹³ irrespective of race, community, language, colour, religion, political or other beliefs, national or ethnic origin¹¹⁴ and (iii) promote equality of opportunity irrespective of the grounds listed in the preceding Article (to which the grounds of 'special needs'¹¹⁵ and sexual orientation are added) in the areas of employment, access to vocational training, working conditions including pay, membership to trade unions or other associations, social insurance and medical care, education and access to goods and services including housing. In other words the mandate of the equality body goes beyond the requirements of Article 13 of the Racial Equality Directive, as it covers discrimination on all grounds in all fields. Although this extensive provision is restricted to the mandate of the equality body, equality body decisions may be used to obtain a judgement in Court therefore

¹¹² The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004), Article 3.(1).(a), Part I

¹¹⁴ Cyprus/ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004), Article 3(1).(b), Part I.

strictly speaking the rights created by these provisions are enforceable through the Courts.

Overall, the role of the Equality body is to deal with all grounds provided for by the Directives including race or ethnic origin, religion, sexual orientation, disability and age as well as other grounds provided for in national law.

Prior to the introduction of the Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation of 2004 N. 58 (1)/2004 (31.3.2004), there were no provisions in Cyprus law on age and sexual orientation discrimination. There is therefore no tradition in discrimination on the basis of these two grounds, although today there are significant developments in the form of court decisions and equality body decisions on the ground of age discrimination, generally regarded by Cypriot society as a less controversial ground than sexual orientation.

The absence of any court decisions on sexual orientation discrimination¹¹⁶ shows the reluctance of homosexuals to make their sexual orientation known in a most negative climate.¹¹⁷ Since its inception in 2004 the Equality Body only started to receive complaints of sexual orientation discrimination in 2008; out of five complaints submitted, three were from non-Cypriots. However, the 2010 ground breaking decision of the equality body recommending the legalisation of same sex partnerships and the emergence of a new NGO for the rights of LGBTs may mean that this landscape will begin to change in the near future.

In 2004, the original framework for Cyprus law existing prior to accession that put into effect the principle of equal treatment and for combating discrimination was widened to cover, beyond the grounds of racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief and disability, the grounds of age and sexual orientation to comply with Article 1 of the

Directives. The ground of religion was covered at least nominally: 'religion' was referred to in the relevant anti-discrimination clause of the Cypriot Constitution. Prior to the transposition of the anti-discrimination Directives, the absence of a comprehensive anti-discrimination legal framework and effective mechanisms for enforcement¹¹⁸ beyond the public sector had rendered the constitutional references to religion rather weak. This was the case despite the decision in the case of Yiallourou which set a precedent in 2001 that constitutional rights are actionable per se not only against the state but also against individuals.¹¹⁹

Since the transposition of the anti-discrimination acquis in 2004, a small number of complaints against the private sector are beginning to emerge, although the number can by no means be compared to the number of complaints against the public sector. This is attributed by the Equality Body officials to the fact that most complainants are aware only of the institution of the Ombudsman whose mandate is restricted to the public sector; few are aware of the existence of the Equality Body and its far reaching powers.

Freedom of religion or belief is guaranteed by article 18 of the Constitution and other international instruments ratified by the Republic as well protection from discrimination on the ground of religion.¹²⁰ Religion or belief is now also covered by the new anti-discrimination legislation of 2004 transposing the acquis. Also, discrimination on the ground of belonging to one of the two communities (the 'Greek' or the 'Turkish' community) is prohibited by article 6 of the Constitution.

¹¹⁹ Yiallourou v. Evgenios Nicolaou (2001), Supreme Court case, Appeal No. 9331, 08.05.2001. In this case, the Director of the Nicosia Sewerage Board sued the civil engineer of the Board for damages for having tapped his telephone for a whole year, which violated his right to privacy and confidentiality of communication under articles 15 and 17 of the Constitution. No material damage was proved and the District Court awarded general damages. Upon appeal to the Supreme Court, the first instance decision was upheld. This decision opens the way for legal action against the state or private persons for discrimination, on the basis of Article 28 of the Constitution, which covers grounds not included in the laws transposing the Employment Equality Directive and the Racial Equality Directive, such as community, language, national or social descent, birth, colour, wealth or "on any ground whatsoever" (Art. 28.2) The resulting remedy from such action, which is just and reasonable compensation for pecuniary and non-pecuniary damage, is additional and of wider ambit than that of the laws transposing the Employment Equality Directive and the Racial Equality Directive. Although the case deals with enforcement of human rights in general and not discrimination in particular, it is important for establishing that constitutional rights such as Article 28 are actionable per se against persons or the state. Given that no case has been decided by Cypriot courts yet on the basis of the laws transposing Directives the Employment Equality Directive and the Racial Equality Directive, and in the absence of jurisprudence, this decision, which preceded the transposition of This Directive, can be used in conjunction with the implementation of the anti-discrimination laws, in order to provide effective and dissuasive remedies.

With regard to the legal regime governing discrimination on the ground of disability, a law existed in this area prior to the transposition of the employment directive (Law N.127(I)/2000) which was amended in 2004 by Law N.57 (1)/2004 and in 2007 by Laws N. 72(I)/2007 and 102(I)/2007 in order to bring it in line with the disability component of The Employment Equality Directive.

2.1.1 Definition of the grounds of unlawful discrimination within the Directives

- a) How does national law on discrimination define the following terms: racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age, sexual orientation? Is there a definition of disability at the national level and how does it compare with the concept adopted by the European Court of Justice in case C-13/05, Chacón Navas, Paragraph 43, according to which "the concept of 'disability' must be understood as referring to a limitation which results in particular from physical, mental or psychological impairments and which hinders the participation of the person concerned in professional life"?

None of the five recognised grounds is defined in any of the four anti-discrimination laws of 2004 or in any other law, with the exception of 'disability' which is defined in a number of laws enacted prior to the transposition of the Employment Equality Directive. The practice followed was that of replicating the wording of the directives, a practice which is perhaps indicative of the drafters' intention to adopt only what is necessary in order to satisfy the directives.¹²¹ Prior to the introduction of the laws transposing the EU anti-discrimination acquis, the approach taken by the Cypriot legislator was not to define the grounds of discrimination, presumably considering that these are self-explanatory in the ordinary use of the language.

Although there is no definition of what is 'religion' for the purposes of the anti-discrimination provision, equality body decisions have established that the term includes atheism. In particular, a 2010 decision of the equality body criticises a school regulations which provides for exempting students from the religious class only if they are 'not of Christian Orthodox faith', adding that the regulation forcing students and parents to reveal their religious convictions (in order for the students to be granted exemption from the religious class) is incompatible with the principle of freedom of thought, conscience and religion.¹²²

¹²¹ The issue has not arisen in Cypriot law in the past as it became an issue in other jurisdictions where there is jurisprudence defining for example what is an 'ethnic' or 'racial' group.

¹²² Report Ref. no. A.K.R. 135/2009, dated 07.11.2010, reported above.

The term 'disability' is defined in the Law concerning Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)2000 enacted prior to the new anti-discrimination laws of 2004: "Disability"¹²³ is defined in article 2 of Law N. 127(I)/2000 as "any form of deficiency or disadvantage that may cause bodily, mental or psychological limitation permanently or for an indefinite duration which, considering the background and other personal data of the particular person, substantially reduces or excludes the ability of the person to perform one or more activities or functions that are considered normal or substantial for the quality of life of any person of the same age that does not experience the same deficiency or disadvantage". No express reference is made in the law protecting persons who have had a disability in the past or who will acquire one in the future.

When comparing the above definition with the concept adopted in the Chacón Navas case, it emerges that the CJEU focused equally on the source of the limitation ("physical, mental or psychological impairments") and on the impact ("which hinders the participation of the person concerned in professional life"). The definition in the Cypriot law first describes the characteristics of this condition in a liberal fashion ("deficiency that may cause indefinite or permanent, mental or psychological or bodily limitation") and then goes on to describe the impact in a rather restrictive mode (substantially reducing or excluding the ability to perform an activity that is "normal" or substantial for the quality of life).

There is no reported case law on the subject. The Ombudsman's Annual Report for 2005 refers to two cases in which the welfare services discontinued the payment of a benefit to persons with a disability on the ground that the disability could potentially be remedied through an operation and that the disability was not permanent, respectively. In both cases, the Ombudsman found that the complainants' disabilities did fit the definition of the term as found in the law because the inference that can be drawn from the medical certificates is that the disability in question is of an indefinite duration. The Ombudsman criticised the practice followed by the welfare office in discontinuing benefits on the basis of the impressions of the social worker who visited the person and stated that decisions touching upon medical knowledge cannot be justified exclusively on the basis of subjective judgement.¹²⁴ An equality body decision in 2007¹²⁵ criticised a scheme of the Ministry of Labour for the provision of care to tetraplegic persons, where tetraplegia is defined as paralysis of the lower limbs resulting from injury to or illness of the bone marrow. The decision found the scheme discriminatory as it treated differently tetraplegic persons whose condition resulted from different reasons and excluded for instance persons whose tetraplegia is due to brain injuries, muscular condition or multiple sclerosis. The Ministry accepted that the definition of tetraplegia they used was restrictive but argued that they chose to adopt this description because their budget for this scheme was very limited.

¹²⁴ File Nos. A/P 2175/04, A/P 368/05, described in the Ombudsman's Annual Report for 2005, published in Nicosia in December 2006.

¹²⁵ 19.06.2007, File No. A.K.I 58/2007, A.K.I. 59/2007, A.K.I. 60/2007, A.K.I. 61/2007 AND A.K.I. 64/2007.

Following the equality body's report, the Ministry decided to extend the definition of the term 'tetraplegia' and accept applications from a wider group of people with tetraplegia, in compliance with the relevant recommendation. A 2010 decision of the Equality Body included a speech impediment as falling within the definition of disability as found in the Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)/2000 as amended.¹²⁶

- b) Where national law on discrimination does not define these grounds, how far have equivalent terms been used and interpreted elsewhere in national law (e.g. the interpretation of what is a 'religion' for the purposes of freedom of religion, or what is a "disability" sometimes defined only in social security legislation)? Is recital 17 of The Employment Equality Directive reflected in the national anti-discrimination legislation?

As stated under (a) above, disability is defined in the law transposing the Employment Equality Directive as well as in the Law on Public Service. In addition, in the Law on Social Insurance 1980 as amended from 1982 - 2008 (Law N. 41/80) disability is defined, for the purposes of that law, as "loss of health, strength or the ability to enjoy life" (article 2(1) of the Law). Article 46 of the same law, which regulates entitlement to disability benefit, provides that an employee who suffered a physical injury as a result of an industrial accident which caused the loss of physical or mental ability the extent of which exceeds 10 per cent. The provision is not intended to amount to an exhaustive definition but rather to determine entitlement to disability under the particular provision.

The Public Benefit Law N. 95(I)/2006 article 2 defines a person with disability as a person who either by birth or as a result of an event that took place before he reached the age of 65 demonstrates any form of insufficiency or disadvantage which causes to him physical mental or psychological restriction of permanent or indefinite duration and which, taking into account the history and other personal circumstances of the person, substantially reduces or excludes the possibility of carrying out any activity or function considered normal or essential for the quality of life of a person of the same age without such disadvantage. In a recent decision in 2009¹²⁷ the equality body criticised this provision as introducing differential treatment of two categories of persons with disabilities on the ground of age (those who acquired a disability before they attained 65 and those who acquired it after 65) and described it as a paradox that causes discrimination which cannot be objectively justified. Based on the equality body's recommendation, the Ministry of Labour is currently considering the revision of this law.

¹²⁶ File Numbers A/Π 2898/2007, A.K.I. 10/2010, dated 23.02.2010. The case is reported above.

¹²⁷ Decision Reference number A.K.R 34/2008, dated 10.04.2009, reported above.

The Law on Public Service (N. 1/1990), which provides for employment opportunities in favour of persons with disabilities in the public sector, defines a “disabled” person as “a person who congenitally or by a subsequent incident suffers full or limited impairment, and the disability originates from a serious deformation or mutilation of the upper part of the lower limbs, or muscle disease, paraplegia, tetraplegia, or loss of sight in both eyes or loss of hearing in both ears or any other serious condition that substantially reduces a person’s physical condition confining the person to a limited circle of jobs.” This definition follows the restrictive tradition of the Article 2 of Law N.127(I)/2000 and it is arguably more restrictive than the position adopted by the CJEU in the Chacón Navas case.

A new law which came into force in late 2009 introducing quotas in favour of persons with disability in the public sector defines ‘person with disability’ as a person who, following an assessment by a multidisciplinary committee, is found to be suffering from a permanent or indefinite insufficiency or disadvantage causing physical, intellectual or mental restrictions in finding and keeping suitable employment.¹²⁸ This wide definition has raised objections amongst the disability movement in Cyprus who find it to be wide enough to cover persons with chronic diseases, who should not be granted benefits at the expenses of persons with disabilities.¹²⁹

There is no definition in the national law of what constitutes ‘religion’; however, the issue has arisen in complaints raised by religious groups¹³⁰, as described further below in this paragraph, although no conclusions were drawn that would amount to or resemble a definition.

The Maronite community complained about the fact that the Constitution classifies them merely as a ‘religious group’, whilst they consider themselves also as “a specific ethnic group”.

¹³⁰ Information supplied to the author by the leaders of the respective communities.

Furthermore, the Latin community¹³¹ of Cyprus is not satisfied with the term “Latin” ascribed to them, as it does not properly reflect their Roman Catholic religious identity (see Opinion on Cyprus by the Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities 2001).¹³² The Roma community is not recognised either as Roma or as a religious group, although recently the Cypriot Government recognised the Roma as a national minority within the meaning of the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities.¹³³ Because of their language and religion, the Roma were traditionally deemed to be an integral part of the Turkish-Cypriot community which is regarded as an ethnic community (i.e. not a minority). In line with this policy, a small section of the Roma community who were Christians was deemed to belong to the Greek community. The ‘affiliations’ of the minorities to one or the other large communities in Cyprus (the Greek or the Turkish) have been repeatedly criticised by the Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities¹³⁴ so it is expected that the ‘affiliations’ may be revised in the near future. Currently, as part of the Turkish-Cypriot community, most of the Roma population of Cyprus are Cypriot passport holders and are entitled to all rights which all other Cypriot citizens have. Therefore differential treatment against Roma (or against Turkish Cypriots) amounts, in accordance with the provisions of Cypriot law, to discrimination on the ground of racial/ethnic origin. Another issue highlighted by international reports which primarily relates to religious freedom, is that of reservist conscientious objectors, many of whom are Jehovah’s Witnesses¹³⁵ and who refuse to serve in the army due to their religious belief.

Recital 17 of the Employment Equality Directive is not reflected in the national anti-discrimination legislation.

- c) Are there any restrictions related to the scope of ‘age’ as a protected ground (e.g. a minimum age below which the anti-discrimination law does not apply)?

¹³¹ The Latins are one of the three constitutionally recognised “religious groups”. They form a small community of persons of Latin ethnic origin and of Catholic faith, recently enlarged to include migrant workers who are Catholics. The other two constitutionally recognised religious groups are the Maronites and the Armenians. Recognition of a group means that they are entitled to protection under the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities.

Law (N.42 (1)/2004) that empowers the Ombudsman to act as the national Equality Body does not provide for any such restrictions. The law transposing the employment Directive¹³⁶ does not contain any specific restrictions related to the scope of 'age' as a protected ground, nor does it specify a minimum age below which the anti-discrimination law does not apply; it follows almost verbatim the wording of the Employment Equality Directive. However, the minimum age for entering employment is fifteen (except for children who are fourteen and who are placed in a program combining work and vocational training).

Law 48(I)/2001 on the "Protection of Young Persons at Work" also allows the employment of children (defined as young persons under fifteen years of age) in cultural, artistic, sports or advertising activities subject to securing a permit from the Labour Minister.

Article 8 of the law transposing the Employment Equality Directive transposes almost verbatim the exceptions provided in Article 6 of the Directive and there are several equality body decisions interpreting this provision. One such decision refers to a legislative provision which allows employers to dismiss employees over 65 years old without compensation. In this case the equality body found that this legislative provision cannot be justified under the exception of Directive article 6 (or article 8 of the Cypriot law) because the Labour Ministry failed to prove that this exception was objectively and reasonably justified by a legitimate aim, such as policy in the field of employment or targets regarding the labour market. The decision rejected the Ministry's argument that after the age of 65 the overwhelming majority of employees are secured through their pension rights, because there still remains a class of persons over 65, however small, who have no pension rights or have reduced pension rights, referring to a European Commission report which places Cyprus first among all EU member states in the poverty risk for persons over 65. Although the equality body referred this law to the Attorney General for revision, no steps in that direction were taken and this law continues to remain in force.

A rather controversial decision of the Equality Body in 2010 criticised the preferential treatment afforded by the Open University to older candidates, stating that it introduces unlawful age discrimination against younger candidates, without specifying the ages of the younger candidates.¹³⁷ In essence this decision seeks to apply the anti-discrimination principle to all ages, young, middle and old.

Another equality body decision regarding the fixing of an age limit in state scholarships, found that the existence of a legitimate aim alone is not sufficient to trigger off the exception of Directive article 6 and that in order for the age criterion to be objectively justified, it must be established that:

- There was no alternative criterion, less discriminatory, for the attainment of the legitimate aim;

¹³⁶ Law on Equality of Treatment in Occupation and Employment N..58 (1)/2004.

¹³⁷ Equality Body Decision dated 22/11/2010, Ref. A.K.I. 74/2009, reported above.

- The specific criterion used was effective (i.e. the legitimate aim was attained);
- The benefits derived from the attainment of this aim are significantly more than the disadvantages created as a result of the application of the criterion in question.

The decision found that no evidence was presented to show that the above conditions were met. The commitment required of the persons to whom scholarship is granted (to work in Cyprus after completion of their studies) as a rule does not exceed two years and is not uniformly applied; this means that the “investment” made in the younger persons does not always pay off and when it does it is short-term (two years) and can easily be written off by a person of 45 years of age or more.

In 2008¹³⁸ the equality body extended the non-discrimination rule to insurance companies who refuse to insure persons over 70 to drive cars, even though age discrimination in the field of services is not yet expressly covered by legislation.¹³⁹ Similarly, in 2008¹⁴⁰ the Equality body decided that a state scheme granting a benefit to persons with severe disability in movement who are over 12 and less than 65 years of age contains age discrimination, even though the law prohibiting age discrimination (Law N.58(I)/2004) does not extend to state benefits. These developments are not unrelated to the prospect of legislating against discrimination in fields beyond employment, in accordance with the Proposal for a Council Directive dated 2.7.2008 on implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation COM(2008) 426.

In 2009 the equality body found that article 27 of the Pensions Law, which provides that persons aged less than 45 years and with 3 years of service receive reduced benefits upon early retirement compared with older workers, does not fall within the exception of the Directive, as the measure is neither proportionate nor objective nor reasonably justified by a legitimate aim: the measure is not proportionate because it affects about 2/3 of the public service workforce; the measure does not serve a legitimate aim because the shortages in scientific personnel invoked by the Public Service Commission have since been covered; and the age limit poses an excessive restriction on the freedom of movement of labour, as the aim of encouraging scientific personnel to stay at work could have been achieved by introducing a condition that pension benefits are payable upon completion of certain years of service irrespective of age.¹⁴¹ This law was also referred to the Attorney General for revision; in 2010 this particular provision was revised but the Equality Body’s recommendation for bringing the benefits of younger persons in line with those received by the older ones was not taken on board.¹⁴²

¹³⁹ Arguably, discrimination in all fields and on all grounds is impliedly covered by the anti-discrimination provision found in article 28 of the Cypriot Constitution.

- d) Please describe any legal rules (or plans for the adoption of rules) or case law (and its outcome) in the field of anti-discrimination which deal with situations of multiple discrimination. This includes the way the equality body (or bodies) are tackling cross-grounds or multiple grounds discrimination. Would national or European legislation dealing with multiple discrimination be necessary in order to facilitate the adjudication of such cases?

There are no legal rules or decisions on the matter. The Ministry of Justice has advised that there are no plans at the moment for the adoption of laws or regulations to deal with multiple discrimination. An equality body decision in 2008 found that the age restrictions contained in a disability benefit scheme were discriminatory but did not look into the specificities created by the combination of the two grounds.

There is no law, practice or precedent in Cyprus which takes into consideration the unique situation arising under the intersectionality of grounds. Given the generally low levels of awareness in Cyprus of anti-discrimination provisions, it is not certain at all that additional laws alone would remedy the problem. Extensive awareness raising and training would have to be carried out for policy makers and members of the legal profession to promote understanding of anti-discrimination in general and the specific situation arising when there is more than one ground at play.

- e) How have multiple discrimination cases involving one of Art. 19 TFEU grounds and gender been adjudicated by the courts (regarding the burden of proof and the award of potential higher damages)? Have these cases been treated under one single ground or as multiple discrimination cases?

No case has appeared before the Cypriot courts combining gender and another ground of discrimination. The burden of proof provision in the legislation has never been tested in the Courts so far.

2.1.2 Assumed and associated discrimination

- a) Does national law (including case law) prohibit discrimination based on perception or assumption of what a person is? (e.g. where a person is discriminated against because another person assumes that he/she is a Muslim or has a certain sexual orientation, even though that turns out to be an incorrect perception or assumption).

The law does not expressly make provision for assumed and associated discrimination. However the concept of discrimination itself, virtually replicating the directive, defines 'direct discrimination' in the following way: "where one person is treated less favourably than another is, has been or would be treated in a comparable situation". Assumed or mistaken characteristics may thus be presumed to satisfy the test of discrimination, which is fairly wide. There has been no case in which this matter was considered by a Cypriot court or by the national Equality body.

- b) Does national law (including case law) prohibit discrimination based on association with persons with particular characteristics (e.g. association with persons of a particular ethnic group or the primary carer of a disabled person)? If so, how? Is national law in line with the judgment in Case C-303/06 Coleman v Attridge Law and Steve Law?

There is no express provision to that effect in laws N.58(1)/2004 and N.59(1)/2004 (transposing the Employment Equality Directive and the Racial Equality Directive), nor any case-law, although both the aforesaid laws contain protection against victimisation in line with the said Directives. The spirit of this provision may be extended to cover the above. The Law on the Commissioner for Administration N. 42(1)/2004 (appointing the Ombudsman as equality body) is much wider in scope, as it covers areas beyond the five grounds prescribed by the two directives.

It is possible to infer that association with persons with particular characteristics is primarily a fundamental human right issue as it relates to the rights of 'freedom of association' and as such one cannot be discriminated against in the exercising of this right. Moreover, discrimination on the basis of association with persons with particular characteristics is a direct violation of the principle of equal treatment and illegal discrimination within the mandate of the Equality body as this type of discrimination is based on precisely the same grounds by way of association. Article 1(1) of Protocol 12 to the ECHR includes "association with a national minority, property, birth or other issues" as one of the prohibited grounds of discrimination. Given that the Equality body's mandate expressly covers the promotion of equality in the enjoyment of rights and freedoms safeguarded by the Conventions ratified by Cyprus and referred to explicitly in the Law¹⁴³ which include Protocol 12, irrespective of race, community, language, colour, religion, political or other beliefs, national or ethnic origin,¹⁴⁴ then association becomes a prohibited ground of discrimination at least vis-à-vis the Equality body; however the grounds expressly affected by this provision are those related to race/ethnic origin (language, colour, religion etc) and do not seem to extend to disability, age or sexual orientation. At the end of the day, whether association with persons carrying certain characteristics is accepted as a prohibited ground for discrimination or not is a matter of interpretation.

An Equality Body decision in 2010 established that discrimination against the main carer of a person with a disability, in this case the mother of a child with a disability, is unlawful discrimination under the law transposing

¹⁴⁴ Cyprus/ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004), Article 3(1).(b), Part I.

The Employment Equality Directive (Law N.58(I)/2004), along the lines of the principle established by Coleman v Attridge Law and Steve Law to which this report refers explicitly.¹⁴⁵ The difference between the case examined by the equality body and Coleman v Attridge Law and Steve Law is that the latter case involves direct discrimination whilst in the former case the complainant was refused preferential treatment as regards her job posting. However the principle was established nevertheless and was reiterated by the Equality Body in the Code of Conduct on disability it issued in September 2010,¹⁴⁶ thus making it harder for the Courts to ignore if and when such a case is presented before them.

2.2 Direct discrimination (Article 2(2)(a))

a) How is direct discrimination defined in national law?

The definition of ‘discrimination’ contained in Articles 2 of both Law N. 59(I) /2004 and Law N. 58(I) /2004 virtually replicates the wording of the Directive.¹⁴⁷ The same wording is followed in the Law on Persons with Disability N. 127(I)/2000 as amended by Law 57(I)/2004. Direct discrimination is defined as “unfavourable treatment” when compared to “a person without disability in the same or similar situation” [s.3 (2)(a)], or on the basis of “characteristics which generally belong to persons with such disability” [s.3 (2)(b)], or “alleged characteristics” [s.3 (2)(c)], or in contravention of a code of practice [s.3(2)(d)]. No definition is provided for instructions to discriminate.

Employment Law defines both direct and indirect discrimination, further discussed below under gender discrimination.

b) Are discriminatory statements or discriminatory job vacancy announcements capable of constituting direct discrimination in national law? (as in Case C-54/07 Firma Feryn)

The issue as to whether a public statement amounts to unlawful direct discrimination in the absence of an identifiable complainant contending that he has been the victim of that discrimination, as was the case in C-54/07 Firma Feryn, has not yet been adjudicated by Cypriot Courts and it is very likely that the principle of locus standi (having a legitimate interest) will apply.

¹⁴⁷ “[L]ess favourable treatment afforded to a person due to [any recognised ground] than the treatment afforded to a person due to [any recognized ground] than another person is, has been or would be afforded in a comparable situation”.

A court decision in 2010 found that a claimant with a disability lacked legitimate interest to claim discrimination for an award intended for disabled athletes winning at the Paralympics Games, because the Games had not taken place yet and because it was not certain that he would win and thus be entitled to the award.¹⁴⁸ The award for disabled athletes, which was significantly lower than the awards designated for athletes without disability, had been the subject of a number of Court cases brought by disabled athletes, however none of these claims succeeded in Court (even for those athletes who did win and thus did have a legitimate interest), as the Court found that the difference in treatment was justified on the basis that the Olympics and Paralympics were essentially different.¹⁴⁹

The Equality Body takes a different stand however. There are a number of Equality body decisions which established discrimination even in the absence of an identifiable claimant affected by the act in question. For instance, in 2005 the Equality body examined a complaint submitted by the Cyprus RAXEN National Focal Point against an application form for employment in a public service position, advertised in the Official Gazette as well as the national press, requiring the applicants to supply personal information including: family status (married/unmarried); patrimonial name of spouse; nationality of spouse at birth; religion and place of birth of applicant and spouse; profession; number of children; sex and age of children; full name, place of birth, religion and profession of applicant's parents. In its decision dated 27.05.2005 the Equality body found that the information required in the form was not necessary for the purposes of appointment and recommended that the said specimen be urgently revised for containing unlawful indirect discrimination on the ground of religion, national or ethnic origin and even family status. No sanction was imposed; however this is not due to the absence of an identifiable complainant but in line with the standard policy of the equality body which is more mediation oriented. The said form was subsequently revised in compliance with the Equality Body's recommendation, although there are still other forms used by the public sector where information such as religion is required. Also in 2010 the Equality Body carried out a self-initiated investigation into a points system followed by the Open University in order to assess candidates, after a complainant who had claimed age discrimination withdrew his complaint.¹⁵⁰

Similarly, on two instances (12.5.2004 and 20.05.2005), the Equality body received complaints that a number of insurance companies had either refused to insure individuals of non-Cypriot origin or had charged them premiums up to two or three times the amount charged to Greek-Cypriots with similar data. The complaints had been submitted by an association of Pontian Greeks as well as by the Cyprus RAXEN National Focal Point, none of whom represented any particular complainant.

¹⁴⁹ Cyprus Athletics Organisation v. Andreas Potamitis (Supreme Court Case No. 111/2007, dated 18.06.2010).

¹⁵⁰ Equality Body Decision dated 22/11/2010, Ref. A.K.I. 74/2009, reported above.

The investigation carried out by the Equality body revealed that some of the companies investigated considered persons of Pontian origin in particular to be bad drivers, unreliable and generally 'high risk' and that there was a policy in place to avoid insuring persons of Pontian origin unless 'guaranteed' or 'recommended' by a Greek-Cypriot. In her report issued on 23.06.2005, the Equality body declared this practice as discriminatory and illegal and recommended that the insurance companies revise their policies. She pointed out that, although the use of criteria such as age, history of claims and condition of the car was acceptable, there is an absolute prohibition against policies based on ethnic or racial criteria. She warned that she would not impose penalties at this stage but that she would not hesitate to impose penalties in the event that the insurance companies do not comply with this recommendation.

Another Equality body decision following a complaint from the chair of the Social Welfare Committee of the Parliament of the Elderly that insurance companies refuse to insure or charge a higher premium for persons over 70, led to a decision that the said policy was discriminatory, despite the absence of an identifiable complainant. However, because the complaint was not directed against any particular insurance company, the Equality body did not take any action other than to advise insurance companies to revise their policies. During 2009 also the equality body investigated complaints against the teachers' union for publically inviting its members to abstain from organising meetings of Turkish Cypriot children and teachers to their schools in the absence of an identifiable complainant.

The wide and liberal approach employed by the Equality body will not necessarily be adopted by the Courts if such a case was presented before them, as their mandate is more limited and technicalities often get in the way of decisions in favour of complainants.

- c) Does the law permit justification of direct discrimination generally, or in relation to particular grounds? If so, what test must be satisfied to justify direct discrimination? (See also 4.7.1 below).

The law generally does not permit justification of direct discrimination, save for specific situations in relation to the grounds of: (a) Religion in the cases of "occupational activities within churches and other public or private organisations the ethos of which is based on religion or belief", where "due to the nature of these activities or framework within which they are exercised, the religion or belief constitutes a genuine, legitimate and justified occupational requirement", as provided in the Employment Equality Directive.¹⁵¹ (b) Age: this follows the exact wording provided for by Article 6 of the Employment Equality Directive.¹⁵² However, a number of Court decisions interpreting article 28 of the Constitution attempt to establish a norm which essentially deviates from the approach of the two anti-discrimination Directives and their CJEU interpretations:

¹⁵¹ Law on Equality of Treatment in Occupation and Employment N.58 (1)/2004, Article 7.

¹⁵² Law on Equality of Treatment in Occupation and Employment N.58 (1)/2004, Article 8.

The norm emerging from the Supreme Court decisions listed in section 3 above is that equality must be applied only to equal situations and that that 'different things ... can only be dealt with differently'.¹⁵³ In these cases, the Court failed to consider that disability was a prohibited ground of discrimination and that the differential treatment afforded to the disabled athletes was thus unlawful.

d) In relation to age discrimination, if the definition is based on 'less favourable treatment' does the law specify how a comparison is to be made?

There is no specific reference as to how the comparison will be made. The basic test used is the same for all grounds of discrimination, which is contained in the definition of direct discrimination (less favourable treatment than the one which another person in an equivalent situation has been subjected to or would have been subjected to).¹⁵⁴

An equality body decision, pursuant to a complaint for age discrimination in a job advertisement, found that the employers' allegation that the particular post requires "high standard of health condition" was a legitimate aim but that the selection of the criterion of age as a means for achieving this aim is neither appropriate nor necessary, nor can it be justified objectively, because a person's age is not necessarily indicative of his/her health condition.¹⁵⁵ Similarly the argument of the postal services that the age limit for the post of mail distributor is justified on the ground that the post requires good health condition was rejected by the equality body, which stated that perceptions about older people not having good health are based on assumptions and stereotypes which are inaccurate and damaging for the persons affected.¹⁵⁶

2.2.1 Situation Testing

a) Does national law clearly permit or prohibit the use of 'situation testing'? If so, how is this defined and what are the procedural conditions for admissibility of such evidence in court? For what discrimination grounds is situation testing permitted? If not all grounds are included, what are the reasons given for this limitation? If the law is silent please indicate.

The law is silent on situation testing and there is no case law either. Following below is an analysis of the subject from the perspective of general rules of evidence as developed by case law.

¹⁵⁴ Law on Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation N.58 (1)/2004, Article 2.

¹⁵⁵ Decision dated 28.06.2007, Ref. A.K.I. 21/2007.

Law on Evidence Cap. 9, which codifies the sources of law, defines the hierarchy of law for both criminal and civil procedure as follows: the Constitution, legislation of the Republic since 1960, Common Law and equity and the statutes of the U.K prior to independence.¹⁵⁷ In July 2006, however, the Constitution was amended to give supremacy to EU Regulations, Directives or other binding legal measures enacted by the EU or its bodies.

The admissibility of situation testing as a method of proving discrimination in courts will be subjected to the general test of 'relevance' and 'the best evidence rule'. A number of factors need to be considered before coming to any conclusion as to the way in which the courts are likely to treat 'situation testing'. If situation testing is to be relied upon as a methodology that merely indicates a tendency as to the 'general' or 'systematic' behaviour of the defendant which is based on previous and/ or similar occasions, then the court may treat situation testing as 'corroborative evidence'. The test will be the extent to which this methodology ascertains a probative value as to the behaviour of the defendant. General common law principles are defined in a series of criminal law cases.¹⁵⁸

In common law there is authority that considers the existence of previous and subsequent facts relevant as they may be indicative of certain situations¹⁵⁹ or as an indication of habitual behaviour.¹⁶⁰ It is up to the party who asserts to prove whether the particular behaviour is systematic or mere coincidence or circumstantial, that will determine the relevance to the particular fact at stake. If however, the situation test is to be relied directly as real evidence of discrimination in action against perpetrators, this is a matter that would require legal argument on the basis of authorities in Europe, the UK and the US which would have to prove that the particular test is widely used in Court as direct evidence of discrimination.

b) Outline how situation testing is used in practice and by whom (e.g. NGOs, equality body, etc)

Situation testing is an unknown concept in Cyprus and is not used by anyone yet. Most if not all NGOs active in the field of anti-discrimination do not have the resources, human or financial,¹⁶¹ to use such methods. The Equality Body has not used this method so far but its officers are open to the idea of using situation testing where the circumstances demand or allow.¹⁶² No NGOs, trade union or other civil society organisation has so far made use or referred to situation testing in Cyprus, which remains an unknown doctrine in Cyprus.

¹⁵⁷ See Cacooyannis, G. (1983) Η Απόδειξη, Limassol, Cyprus and Eliades, T. (1994) Το Δίκαιο της Απόδειξης, Μια Πρακτική Προσέγγιση, Cyprus.

¹⁶¹ Legal aid in Cyprus is subject to means and for this and other reasons very few discrimination cases end up in Court. Thus in order for an NGO to test a case, it would have to apply to the Courts on behalf of a complainant. This would involve both the know-how, the technical skills and the funds to cover legal and judicial costs.

- c) Is there any reluctance to use situation testing as evidence in court (e.g. ethical or methodology issues)? In this respect, does evolution in other countries influence your national law (European strategic litigation issue)?

There is no information about reluctance to use situational testing as evidence in court although Cypriot Courts can allow technicalities to get in the way of admitting essential evidence.¹⁶³ Court decisions from other member states are not often invoked in judicial proceedings in Cyprus nor are they necessarily taken into account by the Courts, with the exception of U.K. Court decisions, which are considered as persuasive but not binding on the Cypriot courts.

- d) Outline important case law within the national legal system on this issue.

There is no case decided on this issue.

2.3 Indirect discrimination (Article 2(2)(b))

- a) How is indirect discrimination defined in national law?

The definition of indirect discrimination contained in Articles 2 of both Law N. 59(I)/2004 and Law N. 58(I)/2004 essentially copies the wording of the Directives.¹⁶⁴

In the field of employment, article 2 of Law 58(I)/2004 defines indirect discrimination as “an apparently neutral provision criterion or practice which may cause unfavourable treatment of a person for one of the reasons referred to in article 3 in relation to other persons unless that provision criterion or practice is objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary”. The grounds mentioned in article 3 of the law are the grounds of the Employment Directive minus disability: race or ethnic origin, religion or belief, age or sexual orientation.

Beyond employment, Law 59(I)/2004 article 2 of Law defines indirect discrimination as “an apparently neutral provision criterion or practice which may put a person of a particular racial or ethnic origin in an unfavourable position in relation to another person, unless that provision criterion or practice is objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary”.

Disability is dealt with separately in Law N. 127(I)/2000 as amended by Law 57(I)/2004 which incorporates a definition identical to the other two laws (N.58(I)/2004 and N.59(I)/2004). However, the disability law contains an additional provision which, although not termed as a definition, offers elements of what would constitute discrimination, without clarifying whether these are to form an exhaustive description. The wording reads: “a person discriminates against another if he treats that person: (a) in a more unfavourable way than what he treats or would treat other persons without disability in the same or in a similar situation; (b) on the basis of characteristics generally belonging to person with such disability or based on a presumed characteristic which generally belongs to a person with such disability or based on a presumed characteristic which is generally attributed to a person with disability; or (c) based on the fact that this person does not satisfy or is not in a position to satisfy a condition, the nature of which is such that a high percentage of persons who do not have such disability satisfy or are in a position to satisfy, when compared to persons who do have such disability and the existence of such a condition is not justified by the circumstances of the case”.¹⁶⁵

This provision appears to be narrower than the Directive’s requirement which extends to any “apparently neutral provision, criterion or practice [that] would put persons having a particular [disability]” at a disadvantage, but since the Directive’s definition is also incorporated no issue of compliance with the Directive arises.

On the issue of the comparison between the treatment of the victim on the one hand and of the comparator on the other hand, the court in the case of Avgoustina Hadjiavraam v. The Cooperative Credit Company of Morphou,¹⁶⁶ found that there was no real person in the selection procedure that could be compared with the applicant and therefore the only comparator is a hypothetical candidate in possession of the same qualifications as the applicant but aged under 26 years old (which was the maximum age set in the job advertisement). In other words, the court adopted the reasoning of the House of Lords in the case Shamoon v. Chief Constable of the Rival Ulster Constabulary which established that, in the comparison between the treatment of the victim and of the comparator, the latter may be an actual person (“treats”) or a hypothetical one (“or would treat”).

Prior to the introduction of the 2004 laws, indirect discrimination was not defined in the Constitution or in any other the legislation, save for the gender provisions in the recent law on equal treatment between men and women.

The relevant case law confirms the constitutional provisions that prohibit ‘direct’ and ‘indirect discrimination’ but no definition is provided in the court judgements.¹⁶⁷

¹⁶⁵ Article 3(2) of Law on Persons with Disabilities N. 127(I)/2000 as amended by Law N.57(I)/2004.

- b) What test must be satisfied to justify indirect discrimination? What are the legitimate aims that can be accepted by courts? Do the legitimate aims as accepted by courts have the same value as the general principle of equality, from a human rights perspective as prescribed in domestic law? What is considered as an appropriate and necessary measure to pursue a legitimate aim?

Although this issue was not directly dealt with by the Courts so far, we may nevertheless assume, on the basis of Cypriot case law on gender discrimination, European court decisions, as well as persuasive authority of UK court decisions, that the 'but for test' is likely to apply. The test involves asking the question as to how the victim would be treated had s/he not had the special characteristic, such as the particular ethnic origin or disability or religion or age that s/he had.

There is no judicial precedent on what test must be used in order for employers to justify a requirement, criterion or practice which results in discrimination. In one cases decided by the Courts on age discrimination, the Court did not seize the opportunity to interpret the term "objective aim" and restricted itself to rejecting the appeal on technical grounds (the practice complained of was based on legislation which the Court did not have the power to amend).¹⁶⁸ In all cases tried by the Courts where allegations of age discrimination were made, the Courts rejected the claims on various procedural or other technical grounds, allowing exceptions to the non-discrimination principle which are wider than those foreseen in The Employment Equality Directive, such as 'unequal' situations which must be treated 'unequally', without offering any definitions of the terms found in the laws transposing the two equality Directives and often giving the impression that they are not at all aware of the existence of such laws.

The equality body has issued a number of reports pursuant to complaints on age discrimination, where the approach is to uphold the general principle of equality and to approach the issue from a human rights perspective. Following below are examples of how the equality body assessed the allegations of employers as to what amounts to 'legitimate aim' and how the "appropriate and necessary measure" is interpreted:

- In the case of a local authority imposing an age limit of 60 to traffic wardens helping school children cross the street, the equality body found in 2010 that the safety of the school children is a legitimate aim within the meaning of the exception in the law, however the choice of the maximum age limit as a measure for the achievement of this aim was neither appropriate nor necessary, because age is not necessarily the ideal criterion for assessing one's physical condition and more objective criteria should apply.¹⁶⁹

¹⁶⁸ Vasos Constantinou v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Public Service Commission; Androula Stavrou v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Public Service Commission, Supreme Court of Cyprus, dated 01.06.2007, Case Nos 1795/2006 and 1705/2, discussed under section 3.5 above.

¹⁶⁹ Decision dated 11.03.2010, ref. A.K.I. 76/2009.

- Regarding the age limit of 40 set as a condition of eligibility in a scheme of financial support for artificial insemination, the equality body found in 2010 that the exclusive use of the age criterion is not the most appropriate means for achievement the legitimate aim of supporting under fertile couples. Instead, the equality body recommended the introduction of a comprehensive system of assessing each application which will take into consideration a number of factors including age, the applicant's physical health, the family status, the nature and quality of family relations that will develop from having a child, the applicant's income level etc.¹⁷⁰
- An equality body decision in 2009¹⁷¹ regarding a legislative provision that restricts eligibility to public benefits to those persons who acquired a disability before the age of 65, stated that differential treatment on the ground of age is allowed, where this is justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving it are appropriate, but any deviations from the equality principle must be defined narrowly, as required by paragraph 6(2) of the draft 'horizontal' Directive.¹⁷² Drawing on this conclusion, the report found that the differential treatment of two categories of persons with disabilities on the ground of age (those who acquired a disability before they attained 65 and those who acquired it after 65) is a paradox that causes discrimination which cannot be objectively justified. The economic consequences for state funds which would result from eliminating this differentiation do not justify the deviation from the equality principle and these consequences may be addressed by the institutionalisation of procedures through which individual cases may be evaluated scientifically.
- A 2009 equality body decision regarding a legislative provision in the Pensions Law which provides for less favourable terms for public servants under 45 who want to take early retirement, found the measure in question to be disproportionate, as it covers 2/3 of the public service workforce; the aim served was not legitimate because the shortages in scientific personnel invoked have since been covered; and the age limit was an excessive restriction on the freedom of movement of labour, as the aim could have been achieved by introducing a condition that pension benefits are payable upon completion of certain years of service irrespective of age.¹⁷³
- In the case of a complaint that insurance policies refuse to insure persons over 70 to drive cars or if they do they charge a higher premium, the equality body found in 2008 that the practice or policy complained of, unsupported by reliable statistical evidence suggesting that persons over 70 have more accidents than younger persons, is not reasonably and objectively justified.¹⁷⁴

- In another equality body case of 2008 regarding the admission requirements into the state nursing school which effectively excluded persons with disabilities, the nursing school alleged that good visual ability is necessary to enable the nurse to assess whether the patient's colour is a cause for concern; a stuttering nurse has communication problems; height and weight of the person is important for moving or lifting patients or for responding fast to emergencies. The decision accepted the above as 'legitimate aim' but pointed out that the employment positions available to graduates of the nursing school are increasingly expanding and may include positions not requiring excellent vision or hearing or other characteristics, adding that the admission requirements should be solely based on how the applicants' characteristics affect their performance as students and not their future employment performance.
- In a 2007 report the Equality Body found that the requirement of a "high standard of health condition" was a legitimate aim but the criterion of age as a means for determining this was not found to be appropriate or necessary.¹⁷⁵
- In the 2007 case of a legislative provision causing persons reaching retirement age to lose their right to compensation for unfair dismissal, the Ministry of Labour argued that the protection of the majority of persons of 65 plus is secured through their pension and provident fund benefits. The equality body found that the legitimate aim had not been clearly explained and that the Ministry failed to prove that the means of achieving it were appropriate and lawful, pointing out that there is a class of pensioners at risk of poverty who absolutely need to work and who are particularly vulnerable to labour law violations.¹⁷⁶
- In the case of the age limit of 60 advertised for a post in the public service, the equality body rejected the allegation that it was intended to assist young people to join the labour market. Instead it used the test whether the nature of the job justified the age limit and whether a similar position in another context would carry an age limit.¹⁷⁷

c) Is this compatible with the Directives?

Yes, Cypriot law complies with Article 2.2(b) of the Directives, although it is doubtful whether the various Court decisions, allowing wide exceptions to the equality principle of the Constitution, meet the Directives' requirements.

d) In relation to age discrimination, does the law specify how a comparison is to be made?

No it does not. Apart from the labour tribunal decision set out below, there is no other source of interpretation of how the comparison is to be made.

¹⁷⁵ Decision dated 28.06.2007, Ref. A.K.I. 21/2007.

¹⁷⁶ Decision dated 11.04.2007, A.K.I. 13/2005.

¹⁷⁷ Decision dated 19.10.2004.

On the issue of the comparison between the treatment of the victim on the one hand, and of the comparator on the other hand, the court found that there was no real person in the selection procedure that could be compared with the applicant and therefore the only comparator is a hypothetical candidate in possession of the same qualifications as the applicant but aged under 26 years (which was the maximum age set in the job advertisement forming the subject matter of the lawsuit).¹⁷⁸ In other words, the court adopted the reasoning of the House of Lords in the case Shamoon v. Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary which established that, in the comparison between the treatment of the victim and of the comparator, the latter may be an actual person (“treats”) or a hypothetical one (“or would treat”).

An equality body decision may also be relevant in interpreting this provision. In a decision relating to the fixing of a maximum age in a public service post, the test used by the equality body in order to determine whether age discrimination existed or not was whether the nature of the job justified the fixing of a maximum age limit and whether similar positions in other contexts (i.e. of equivalent seniority, in similar fields etc) carry an age limit. The case concerned the age limit of 60 fixed in respect of the appointment of members of the Commission on Educational Service and the test applied was whether the functions performed by the public service committee (where no age limit applies) are substantially different to those of the education committee. As the answer to this question was negative, the report concludes that there was no reasonable justification in permitting an age limit for the latter.¹⁷⁹ Similarly, a decision pursuant to a complaint for age discrimination in the fixing of age limit for the position of temporary postal distributor at the public post office, found the age limit unjustified, inter alia, because the post of permanent postal distributor does not carry any age limit.¹⁸⁰

e) Have differences in treatment based on language been perceived as potential indirect discrimination on the grounds of racial or ethnic origin?

The Courts in Cyprus have not as yet dealt with this issue as no cases on racial or ethnic discrimination have been brought before them. However, there are a number of equality body decisions pursuant to complaints regarding language, where it was established that language discrimination is also potentially indirect discrimination on the ground of race or ethnic origin.

On 01.08.2006 the Equality body decided on a complaint submitted by an EU national regarding a requirement by the semi-governmental Cyprus Tourism Organisation, that in order for permits to operate a tourist office to be granted, a Greek-speaking manager must be hired.

¹⁷⁹ Decision dated 08.11.2004.

¹⁸⁰ Decision dated 05.12.2007, Ref. A.K.I. 68/2007, A.K.I. 78/2007, A.K.I. 108/2007.

The Equality Body criticised the practice of requiring knowledge of the national language, which constitutes discrimination on the ground of language amounting, at the same time, to indirect discrimination on the ground of race/ethnic origin. The decision referred also to Regulation 1612/68/EEC which sets as a target for the EU towards the elimination of all forms of discrimination as a result of nationality in the field of employment, as well as to the law transposing the Employment Equality Directive, which prohibits direct or indirect discrimination on the ground of race or ethnic origin in employment, occupation and self-employment. The decision further instructs that this regulation be abolished, in accordance with the law transposing the Employment Equality Directive which provides that all laws and regulations contravening the said law must be abolished.¹⁸¹

In two other cases, the equality body examined complaints from two EU citizens against article 11 of the Estate Agents Law which requires good knowledge of Greek or Turkish as a prerequisite for the acquisition of a practising licence. The decision found that the said provision amounts to discrimination on the ground of language and, by extension, to indirect discrimination on the ground of ethnic origin in the field of access to the profession of the estate agent.¹⁸²

Furthermore, the Equality body examined a complaint by a foreign national whose application to the Registration Council of Building Contractors was not processed because his certificate was in English. During the investigation of the complaint, it emerged that the Council would readily consider applications by Cypriot citizens whose certificates were in English but requested non-Cypriots to have their certificates translated into Greek. The Ombudsman found that the practice of differential treatment of Cypriot and non-Cypriot applicants amounts to unlawful discrimination on the ground of racial/ethnic origin and also that insistence for translation into Greek of documents composed in a language known to the competent body amounts to violation of the principle of bona fides.¹⁸³

In spite of the fact that the requirement of Greek language is treated by the equality body as potentially discriminating, the same treatment is not afforded to the non-use of the Turkish language, which is not deemed to be discriminatory or potentially discriminating on any ground whatsoever. Although Turkish remains an “official language” according to the Constitution, as noted by the Report of the Committee of Experts on the application of the European Charter for European or Minority Languages in Cyprus,¹⁸⁴ “Turkish has basically ceased to function as an official language.” In the Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages in Cyprus of 23.09.2009 it was noted that “the Turkish language in the government controlled area was de facto in a similar position to a regional or minority language but that it did not benefit from the protection under the Charter because of its official status under the Constitution of the Republic.”

¹⁸⁴ Council of Europe, ECRML (2006)3, Strasbourg, 27.09.2006, at para. 39

The Cypriot government's reaction to this comment was that, on the one hand, Turkish is an official language of the state and as such does not fall within the scope of the Charter and, on the other hand, that its legal status is guaranteed by the Constitution. The government also alleged that Turkish is used in practice in the Administration, by public authorities and in the content of official documents which is not accurate. On 31.05.2006 the Equality body examined a complaint that the non-use of the Turkish language in the Official Gazette,¹⁸⁵ in public signs and posts and in public announcements and publications of the government amounted to discrimination in violation of the Constitution and of the anti-discrimination laws. The equality body found that the obligation to use Turkish in public documents, based on Article 3(1) of the Constitution, was one of the provisions suspended by the 'doctrine of necessity'.¹⁸⁶

The non-availability of information in the Turkish language was one of the 'areas of concern' to which the Third ECRI Report on Cyprus draws the attention of the Cypriot government.¹⁸⁷

2.3.1 Statistical Evidence

- a) Does national law permit the use of statistical evidence to establish indirect discrimination? If so, what are the conditions for it to be admissible in court?

There is nothing in the law that prohibits the use of statistical evidence to establish indirect discrimination; in fact it can be inferred that from the wording of the anti-discrimination laws transposing the acquis, which replicates the wording of the EU directives the use of statistics must be permitted. So far no case has been considered at court to examine such an issue.

- b) Is the use of such evidence widespread? Is there any reluctance to use statistical data as evidence in court (e.g. ethical or methodology issues)? In this respect, does evolution in other countries influence your national law?

It is not common for statistical evidence to be used; the equality body has made use of statistical data in only a few cases so far.

¹⁸⁷ ECRI (2005) Third Report on Cyprus, European Commission against Racism and Intolerance, Council of Europe, Strasbourg, 16 May 2006, paragraph 82.

Once such case concerned discrimination against female migrant domestic workers whose right to join a trade union was restricted by the standard employment contract they were forced to sign.¹⁸⁸ In the reasoning of this decision, the Equality body also made reference to the low salaries paid to migrant domestic helpers¹⁸⁹ compared to Cypriot workers, pointing out that the number of migrant female domestic workers now in Cyprus is about 18,000.¹⁹⁰ The data was used in this report in order to highlight the acuteness of the problem, based on the large size of this group and on the disparity in the salaries of migrants and locals, rather than to determine whether an act is or is not discriminatory. During 2010 the Equality Body commissioned a survey into the vocational training needs of the female migrant domestic workers which rendered a series of interesting results on the profile of this highly vulnerable group. Although the purpose of choosing to focus on vocational training needs is not clear, the interest of the Equality Body in the use of statistical data is obvious. Opinion surveys were also commissioned by the Equality Body in previous years, mainly in order to assess public opinion towards various vulnerable groups (LGBTs, Pontian-Greeks, persons with disability) although the results were used more for awareness raising rather than for reaching a legal decision.

In 2008 the equality body examined an age discrimination complaint against several insurance companies whose policy is to refuse to insure persons over 70 to drive cars or to charge them higher premiums. The equality body's decision found that the practice or policy complained of, unsupported by reliable statistical evidence, is not reasonably and objectively justified and therefore amounts to discrimination.¹⁹¹ It follows that had statistical evidence shown that persons over 70 are indeed more accident prone, then the difference in treatment would have been justified and therefore not discriminatory. Thus the equality body appears to have been prepared to accept statistical evidence in order to decide whether discrimination had taken place or not.

There is no information about any reluctance of the Courts to use statistical data as evidence and there have been cases where statistical evidence was introduced and deemed admissible, although this is not so common as a practice. There was no such case in 2010.

c) Please illustrate the most important case law in this area.

There is no case law on the use of statistical evidence in the anti-discrimination field, although there is case law on the use of statistical evidence in other areas of the law.

¹⁸⁸ Cyprus Ombudsman Report File No. A.K.I 2/2005, dated 4.11.2005. The Minister of Interior has informed us that he has issued the relevant order for the pay increase but is waiting for the relevant Government department to estimate the costs involved for pensioners who employ domestic helpers so that their benefit is increased accordingly. The decision of the Equality body is still not complied with.

¹⁸⁹ Calculated at CYP0.82 per hour, contrasted with CyP4 –CyP 5 per hour for Cypriots carrying out the same work: Cyprus Ombudsman Report File No. A.K.I 2/2005, dated 4.11.2005, page 4.

¹⁹¹ Equality Body decision ref. 125/2007 dated 21.10.2008, reported under section 3.14 above.

In the case of *Andreas Kaskavalis v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Ministry of Transport and Public Works and the Licensing Authority*¹⁹² the Supreme Court rejected an appeal against a decision of the Licensing Authority by which the appellant's application for a taxi license was turned down based, inter alia, on statistics of the Cyprus Tourism Organisation about tourist arrivals for the period in question. The decision impliedly accepted the use of statistics by the Licensing Authority in order to decide on the appellant's application for a taxi license.

d) Are there national rules which permit data collection? Please answer in respect to all five grounds. The aim of this question is to find out whether or not data collection is allowed for the purposes of litigation and positive action measures. Specifically, are statistical data used to design positive action measures? How are these data collected/generated?

There is a general rule prohibiting the collection of such data that derives from article 8 of the ECHR and is also contained in article 15 of Constitution, unless specifically provided under certain circumstances. The Law on Processing of Personal Data N.138(I)/2001, as amended by Law N.37(I)/2003, prohibits the collection and processing of sensitive personal data and lists the circumstances under which this is exceptionally allowed. Three of these are relevant to this context: (a) Processing is necessary for the satisfaction of lawful interest which is superior to the rights and fundamental freedoms of the subject of the data;¹⁹³ (b) Processing concerns exclusively data that the subject of it has published or is necessary for the recognition or the exercise of a right before a court;¹⁹⁴ (c) Processing concerns exclusively statistical, research, scientific or historical reasons, subject to ensuring that measures are taken to protect the subjects of the data.

In 2005 the European Commission notified the Data Protection Commissioner that there were sections of its Processing of Personal Data Law of 2001 that did not comply with the European data protection directive. These included the provisions on the right of information, transfer of data to third countries and procedural mechanisms.¹⁹⁵ Following this, the Data Protection Commissioner drafted amending legislation which purports to bring the law in line with Directive 95/46/EC. At the time of writing, the said draft legislation was being examined by the Attorney General's office following which it will be sent to the House of Representatives for voting. The said draft has been before the Attorney General's office for some years now without much progress but then delays in processing legislation are common in Cyprus. The Framework Decision on the protection of personal data processed in the framework of police and judicial cooperation in criminal matters has not been transposed yet.

¹⁹⁵ See http://ec.europa.eu/justice_home/fsj/privacy/docs/wpdocs/2006/9th_annual_report_en.pdf (28.01.2009).

Although most of the grounds covered by the anti-discrimination Directives are classified in the existing law as constituting sensitive data and at points this law covers grounds beyond those of the anti-discrimination directives, age is missing from the protected characteristics. 'Sensitive data' is defined in the law as data concerning racial or national¹⁹⁶ origin, political belief, religious or philosophical conviction, participation in an organisation, association or trade union, health (which is much wider in scope than 'disability'), sex-life and sexual orientation, criminal prosecution or criminal conviction.¹⁹⁷

"Personal data" is defined in the law as any information referring to the subject of data, i.e. a physical person, who is still in life. Aggregate data of a statistical nature, from which the subjects of the data can no longer be detected, are not considered as 'personal data'.

Under article 6(3) of Law 138(I)/2001, the Council of Ministers may issue regulations following a proposal by the Personal Data Protection Commissioner, on the processing of data in cases other than the ones provided for under the law when there are serious reasons of public interest involved.

In response to an enquiry which the author made to the Cyprus Commissioner for the Protection of Personal Data, the Commissioner informed that: "The collection and keeping by employers of data of their employees in respect of their ethnic or racial origin, disability, religion or belief or sexual orientation (sensitive data) as a rule is prohibited. It is permitted if this is necessary so that the employer fulfils his/her obligations in the field of employment law and s/he obtains a license for this purpose from the Personal Data Commissioner (Article 6(1) (2) (a) of the Law on processing of Personal Data)".¹⁹⁸ One may conclude that the employee's written authorisation is not necessary in the aforesaid cases. Presumably the same principle would apply outside the employment field. Based on the Commissioner's statement as aforesaid, one may safely assume that the law will be interpreted and applied by the courts in a way compatible with the Data Commissioner's interpretation.

¹⁹⁸ Law No. 138(I)2001. In reply to a question she replied in writing dated 13.12.2005.

In order to apply the regulation concerning access to the labour market¹⁹⁹, the Labour Office of the Ministry of Labour maintains records concerning country of origin, ethnic origin and whether they are asylum seekers or not.

In the non-employment field, data on ethnic origin is kept at the national level for various purposes. For instance, the population censuses carried out by the Statistical Service of the Republic keeps figures on each of the ethnic and religious communities of Cyprus (Greek-Cypriots, Turkish Cypriots, Maronites, Armenians and Latins). The Roma are not classified separately nor identified as such by the educational system, as they are considered to be part of the Turkish Cypriot community. Constitutionally, the Roma do in fact form part of the Turkish-Cypriot community, since by virtue of the Constitution they could only belong to one or the other community; however, the same applies to the Maronites, the Latins and the Armenians, who are constitutionally part of the Greek-Cypriot community, and they are nevertheless afforded a separate classification from the Greek-Cypriot Statistical Service.²⁰⁰ The Ministry of Education also keeps data on school children according to their ethnic (as well as their national) origin; again the Roma are not classified separately but are integrated into the figure for Turkish-Cypriots. In some tables supplied by the Ministry, a group of pupils are classified as ‘Turkish-speaking’; this term would include primarily Turkish-Cypriots but to some extent also Roma and Kurdish pupils. The records which are publicly accessible do not show names of individuals, only numbers per ethnic origin. Schools do keep data on the pupils’ religion, which is also noted on the school leaving certificate they receive upon graduation.

In some cases, particularly relating to positive measures in education there is evidence suggesting that statistical data is used in order to design positive action measures.

¹⁹⁹ A circular letter sent from the Immigration Office of the Ministry of Interior dated 18.04.2005 sets the order of priority in terms of employment as follows: i. First priority: Cyprus nationals, EU nationals and their families, irrespective of nationality. Also, persons of Greek origin who are holders of special identity card of the Republic of Cyprus, but not members of their families who are third country nationals.
 ii. Second Priority: Nationals of acceding countries.
 iii. Third priority: Family members of nationals of acceding countries who are already in Cyprus, irrespective of nationality.
 iv. Fourth priority: Third country nationals already in Cyprus, including asylum seekers.
 v. Fifth priority: Family members of third country nationals already in Cyprus, except asylum seekers.
 vi. Sixth priority: Third country nationals (new arrivals).

²⁰⁰ Upon the establishment of the Republic, all religious groups were asked to choose as to whether they should belong to the Greek Cypriot community or the Turkish Cypriot community. They opted to belong to the former. The Roma were not asked to choose; they were simply assumed to belong to the Turkish Cypriot community because of their common religion (Muslim) and language.

For instance, in order for the Education Ministry to place a school within the “Educational Priority Zone”, an investigation is carried out into poverty levels in the area, concentration of non-native Greek speakers, drop out rate etc.²⁰¹ Similarly, data is kept on the native language (i.e. ethnic origin) of the members of the school population in order to determine where and to what extent Greek language classes must be introduced in an effort to foster integration. Also, in order to decide whether to open a Turkish speaking school, in compliance with the request of the UN Peace Keeping Force in Cyprus (UNFICYP), the government carried out a survey amongst the Turkish speaking families of the area concerned in order to establish whether they wanted to send their children to such a school. The survey showed that the parents preferred to send their children to the mainstream Greek school, and thus the government decided not to set up a Turkish school.²⁰² In the confrontation that has been ongoing between the Ministry of Education and Maronite community for the past few years regarding the Ministry’s failure to raise the subsidies for school fees of Maronite students attending private schools, statistical evidence was used by the representative of the Maronite community in order to prove that only a small percentage of the Maronite students enrolled at the minority schools for which subsidies were offered. This confrontation has led to an Equality Body decision in 2010 reported above.²⁰³

In 2010 an Equality Body report criticised the procedure for exemption of pupils from the religious class at schools, and particularly the fact that the pupils’ parents are asked to declare their religion, pointing out that a person’s religion constitutes sensitive personal data that should not be revealed unless there is objective and reasonable justification serving a legitimate aim. The report recommended that students be exempted from the religious class without having to reveal their religious beliefs and for reasons of conscience and that a special form should be introduced for parents to complete when requesting exemption from the religious class expressly stating that there is no obligation to reveal one’s religion.²⁰⁴

On 08.07.2010 the Ombudsman issued a report pursuant to a complaint submitted a month earlier by a lawyer on behalf of a migrant woman who is an HIV carrier and was being detained for the purposes of deportation, after her asylum application had been rejected.²⁰⁵

²⁰¹ This measure, which has been in place for some years now, aims at placing in a special category certain schools where special attention and particular measures are needed to address certain educational needs, such as pupils coming from particularly poverty-stricken areas, high concentration of non-native Greek speakers, high drop out rate etc. Schools classified as falling within EPZ receive extra teaching hours and other measures where needed. The institution of EPZ aims at reducing inequalities for pupils attending schools in disadvantaged areas with an increased proportion of immigrants, combating school failure and illiteracy.

The guards at the detention centre informed all other inmates that she was suffering from HIV/AIDS and should therefore be using a separate washroom. Because of this, all other inmates and guards behaved towards her with repulsion; no one would approach her or touch her and members of staff would not even place her pills in her palm but instead would throw them on the floor from a distance and she would have to collect them from the floor. Even when an officer from the Ombudsman's office visited the detention centre to investigate the case, the police officer in charge prompted her to keep her distance from the complainant so as not to risk transmission of the virus. The Ombudsman's report concluded that sensitive data concerning the complainant's health were revealed to third parties unlawfully and without her consent. The fears expressed by the members of staff that the non-revelation of the complainant's condition would have endangered the health of other persons using the same space were not seen as valid, since the medical certificate which the complainant was issued by the state hospital and which had been notified to the management of the detention centre expressly stated that the complainant did not suffer from any contagious disease endangering public health.

In the field of disability, where positive measures often take the form of grants, there is little evidence of the use of statistical data in order to design positive measures. This was evident from a particular scheme examined by the equality body targeting a certain class of tetraplegic persons, as detailed in the description of this case presented under section 2.1.1(a) above. A new measure introduced during 2010, involving the covering of the costs for escorts for persons with disability was designed after the disability organisations submitted, upon the request of the Ministry of Labour, details on the numbers amongst their members that would make use of such service. The amount of the funding granted was commensurate with the numbers of persons with disabilities that would be benefiting from the services of the escorts. Other measures in the disability field which do not involve the granting of monetary benefits, such as the preferential parking provided in the recent amendment to the disability law,²⁰⁶ appear to be the result of pressure from the disability movement rather than the result of the use of statistical data.

2.4 Harassment (Article 2(3))

- a) How is harassment defined in national law? Include reference to criminal offences of harassment insofar as these could be used to tackle discrimination falling within the scope of the Directives.

As a concept, harassment was first introduced into Cyprus law in 2002 with Law N. 205(I)/2002 on the Equal Treatment of Men and Women in Employment and Vocational Training that came into force on 1st January 2003. This law introduced "harassment based on sex" as part of the definition of "sexual harassment". Later, in amending Law N. 40(I)/2006, the two terms are defined separately.

²⁰⁶ Law amending the Law on Persons with Disability N. 102(I)/2007 article 2.

In Laws 58(I) and 59(I), as well as the Law (amendment) Concerning Persons with Disabilities Law 57(I)/2004, harassment is defined as “unwanted conduct related to any of the [recognised] ... grounds ... with the purpose or effect of violating the dignity of a person and of creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment”.

In 1992 a law was introduced amending the Law ratifying the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination of 1967, rendering certain public statements a criminal offence, which bear similarity to the above definition of harassment. The law provides that any person who publicly, either orally or in writing through written text, imaging or in any other way, intentionally incites acts which may cause discrimination, hatred or violence against persons or groups of persons for the sole reason of their racial or ethnic origin or their religion, is guilty of a criminal offence.²⁰⁷

b) Is harassment prohibited as a form of discrimination?

Harassment is a prohibited form of discrimination:

- on the ground of disability, under Article 3(1)(e) of Law N.127(I)2000 as amended by Law 57(I)2004;
 - in the field of employment on the ground of age, sexual orientation, race/ethnic origin and religion under Article 6(1)(c) of Law 58(I)2004 (which transposes the Employment Directive plus the employment component of the Racial Equality Directive)
 - in fields beyond employment on the ground of race/ethnic origin, under Article 5(2)(c) of Law 59(I)2004 (which transposes the Race Directive minus the employment component).
- c) Are there any additional sources on the concept of harassment (e.g. an official Code of Practice)?

²⁰⁷ Article 2A(1) of the Law amending the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination (Ratification) Law of 1967, No. 11(III) of 1992.

²⁰⁸ But there are a number of decisions on the issue of sexual harassment.

Prior to the enactment of the 2004 laws transposing the two anti-discrimination directives, there were no provisions in national law for harassment on the grounds of racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation, even though there had been reports of complaints about racial harassment of migrants and of Turkish Cypriots in the south.²⁰⁹ There were however provisions for sexual harassment.

The Law for Equal Treatment of Men and Women in Employment and Occupational Training defines sexual harassment as “any behaviour that is unwanted by the recipient of the behaviour of sexual nature or any other behaviour based on sex, which offends the dignity of women and men during employment or occupational education or during access to employment or occupational education or training which is manifested via words or deeds”. In amending Law N. 40(I)/2006 on the Equal Treatment of Men and Women in Employment and Vocational Training, the terms “harassment” and “sexual harassment” are defined separately.

A code of conduct was issued by the union of Employers (Employers and Industrialists and Federation – OEV) in 2007 on discrimination at the workplace in general, but does not offer any additional insight into the meaning of harassment other than what the law provides. A code of conduct issued by the equality body in February 2007 on sexual harassment provides the following definition: “Sexual Harassment is behaviour which is unwanted and unpleasant to its receiver which creates a frightening, hostile, insulting and/or humiliating working environment. Sexual harassment can take many forms including physical contact, comments, “jokes” or propositions, exposure to insulting material or other behaviour which contributes to the creation of a hostile working environment”. A list of examples of what constitutes sexual harassment at the workplace is also offered.

The Code of Conduct on disability discrimination at the workplace issued by the Equality Body in September 2010 defines harassment as unwanted behaviour connected with a person’s disability intending to or resulting in insulting a person’s dignity or creating a frightening, hostile, humiliating, degrading or aggressive environment and includes a wide range of unwanted behaviour.

²⁰⁹ A number of Reports indicate that there were complaints and allegation of discrimination (see ECRI Report 2001/ ISAG 2003). Several cases of complaints by migrant workers against the Police and the Immigration Office involving racial discrimination and harassment have been investigated by the Ombudsman. According to the 2001 Ombudsman’s Annual Report, a total of 156 complaints were lodged. In the following years 2002 and 2003 the figures are similar. No details are available about these cases, other than the fact that they were mainly concerned with issues of entry, stay, violation of contracts or employment rights. These cases date back to the period before the enactment of the new anti-discrimination laws and the appointment of the Commissioner as the specialised anti-discrimination body, therefore these complaints were examined on the basis of the legal framework which existed prior to May 2004 and which did not contain comprehensive anti-discrimination provisions.

The Code went on to establish that a behaviour intending to insult a person with disability or creating a hostile environment amounts to harassment irrespective of whether it actually had any impact on the affected person: for instance when a person with learning difficulties is often described by his/her colleagues as 'stupid' this amounts to harassment even if the affected person is not present when these comments are made. However, if a behaviour has no intention of insulting a person or creating a hostile environment, then it amounts to harassment only if it can reasonably be considered that it had the result the creating of a hostile environment or of insulting a person's dignity. The code offers two examples to exemplify this distinction: (a) a person who stutters feels offended when his manager is jokingly making fun of his speech impediment. Although he has repeatedly asked his manager to stop this, the latter continues claiming that it is only a joke. This behavior amounts to harassment as it can reasonably be considered to have insulted a person's dignity. (b) A person who forwards by e-mail to his colleagues a joke about autistic persons commits harassment when an autistic person working in the same firm receives this e-mail and feels insulted, even though there was no intention to insult the particular co-worker.

The code merely explains and exemplifies the law; it has no power to provide for sanctions or other measures not foreseen in the law. In the general section, however, the code recommends to employers to put in place a complaints mechanism at work to enable the employee to make the employer aware of his/her problem. The code explains that such mechanism should facilitate the reaching of a mutually acceptable solution before the problem becomes a big issue that can only be resolved through the Equality Body procedures or through judicial procedures.

There are several court decisions on the issue of harassment in general (i.e. not in the anti-discrimination field), but none offering any definition of the term.

2.5 Instructions to discriminate (Article 2(4))

Does national law (including case law) prohibit instructions to discriminate? If yes, does it contain any specific provisions regarding the liability of legal persons for such actions?

National law prohibits instructions to discriminate on the grounds of race/ethnic origin, age, religion or belief, sexual orientation and disability.²¹⁰ Prior to the introduction of the laws transposing the anti-discrimination acquis, there were no provisions in Cyprus law prohibiting instructions to discriminate as provided by Article 2.4 on any grounds, nor was there any comparable definition of such provisions in relation to gender discrimination in the national gender equality legislation.

²¹⁰ Article 6(1)(d) of Law 58(I)2004 (transposing the Employment Directive); Article 5(2)(d) of Law 59(I)2004 (transposing the Race Directive); Article 3(a) of Law 57(I)/2004 for the ground of disability.

The liability of legal persons for all offences created by the laws transposing the two Directives is established by article 4 of Law 58(I)/2004 (transposing The Employment Equality Directive minus disability and the employment component of The Racial Equality Directive), as well as by article 4(1) of Law 59(I)/2004 (transposing The Racial Equality Directive minus the employment component) which provide that the laws apply to “all persons in the public and private domain including public bodies, local authorities of self-governance and organisations of public and private law.” Also, different sanctions apply for natural and for legal persons (detailed in section 3.1.2 below).

2.6 Reasonable accommodation duties (Article 2(2)(b)(ii) and Article 5 Directive 2000/78)

- a) How does national law implement the duty to provide reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities? In particular, specify when the duty applies, the criteria for assessing the extent of the duty and any definition of ‘reasonable’. For example, does national law define what would be a “disproportionate burden” for employers or is the availability of financial assistance from the State taken into account in assessing whether there is a disproportionate burden? Please also specify if the definition of a disability for the purposes of claiming a reasonable accommodation is the same as for claiming protection from non-discrimination in general, i.e. is the personal scope of the national law different (more limited) in the context of reasonable accommodation than it is with regard to other elements of disability non-discrimination law.

When the Employment framework Directive was transposed in 2004, the only provision for reasonable accommodation was to be found in the disability law, which provides for the duty to adopt “reasonable measures” to the extent and where the local economic and other circumstances allow.²¹¹ These measures are not restricted to the working place but cover: (a) basic rights (right to independent living, diagnosis and prevention of disability, personal support with assistive equipment, services etc, accessibility to housing, buildings, streets, the environment, public means of transport, etc, education, information and communication through special means, services for social and economic integration, vocational training, employment in the open market, etc etc);²¹² (b). employment including access to, working conditions, training etc etc;²¹³ (c). supply of goods and services, including the facilitation of accessibility for safe and comfortable use of such services, etc etc;²¹⁴ transport;²¹⁵ and telecommunications.²¹⁶

²¹² Article 4 of the Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)2000.

²¹³ Article 5 of the Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)2000.

²¹⁴ Article 6 of the Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)2000.

²¹⁵ Article 7 of the Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)2000.

²¹⁶ Article 8 of the Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)2000.

Specifically with regard to reasonable accommodation at the working place, the law provides that “equal treatment” means, inter alia, “the obligation to provide reasonable access and facilities in the working environment, including: (i) the necessary modifications or adjustments of accessibility to existing facilities so as to make them accessible to persons with disabilities; (ii) the reshaping of work by creating working schedules of part-time occupation or modified working hours, with the acquisition of new or the modification of existing equipment, machinery, tools, means and any facilities or services”.²¹⁷

The above provisions did not entirely transpose the spirit of the Directive which provided for a mandatory duty to provide reasonable accommodation. Thus, an amendment to the disability law in 2007 added a new article which provides that, in order for the principle of equal treatment of persons with disabilities to be implemented, the employer must take reasonable measures depending on the needs arising in any particular case, so that a person with a disability has access to an employment post, to carry out his/her profession or to be promoted, or to undergo training, so long as these measures do not lead to disproportionate burden for the employer; the burden is not disproportionate when it is sufficiently balanced by measures adopted by the state in favour of persons with a disability (article 5(1A) of the law).²¹⁸

Prior to the 2007 amendments, the law required that the principles established in articles from 4 to 8 of the law, being: the basic rights of persons with disabilities, i.e. independent living, prompt diagnosis, accessibility etc (article 4); the right to equal treatment as derived from the Employment Equality Directive (article 5); the right to equal treatment in the provision of goods and services (article 6); accessibility in public transport (article 7); and access to telecommunications and information (article 8), be exercised with the adoption of reasonable measures, which are defined in article 9(1). According to this, the factors which must be taken into account in order to determine whether a measure is reasonable or not, as follows (article 9(2)):

- (1) The nature and required cost for the adoption of the measures;
- (2) the financial sources of the person who has the obligation to adopt the measures;
- (3) the financial situation and other obligations of the state in those cases where the obligation for the adoption of measures refers to the state;
- (4) the provision of donations by the state or other sources as a contribution towards the total cost of the said measures;
- (5) the socio-economic situation of the person with the disability concerned.

In theory, individuals do have a right of action in respect of all these rights, although in some cases the right is so vague and abstract that its practical application is hard to conceive. No particular body is mandated with oversight for the implementation of these provisions.

²¹⁸ Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)2000, as amended by Law No. 72(I) of 2007.

The law provides that the aforesaid factor (socio-economic situation of the disabled claimant) must not be taken into account as regards the principle of non-discrimination in employment.

It is apparent that the justifications set out in article 9(1) for failing to provide reasonable accommodation are much wider than in the Employment Directive, which provides only for the test of “disproportionate burden on the employer”. This means that in respect of the rights affected by article 9(1) of the law, being the right to independent living, prompt diagnosis, accessibility etc (article 4); the right to equal treatment in the provision of goods and services (article 6); and access to telecommunications and information (article 8,) the duty to provide reasonable accommodation is conditional upon the wide pre-requisites of articles 9(1) and 9(2) and is far from mandatory.

This however does not amount to a deviation from the Employment Equality Directive because, since the 2007 amendments, there is a mandatory obligation on the employer to take reasonable measures, subject only to the condition that the measure does not lead to disproportionate burden for the employer, which is in line with the duty set out in the Employment Equality Directive (article 5(1A)).

This provision is no longer subject to the restrictive provisions of article 9(1) which require the rights falling under its ambit to be exercised with the adoption of “reasonable measures” so wide in scope that the fall short of creating a mandatory regime. In addition, the rest of the provisions of article 5 (right to equal treatment including the right to reasonable accommodation), as well as article 7 (accessibility to public transport) are also removed from the ambit of article 9(1), to the effect that all rights created by articles 5 and 7 are now absolute and are not subject to the adoption of “reasonable measures” (article 5(1A)) (although article 7 is subject to the issue of regulations, which has not as yet materialised).

The definition of a disability for the purposes of the reasonable accommodation provision is no different to that applicable for other elements of the law.

No case has actually been examined in court so far to assess how courts would determine whether accommodation is ‘reasonable’ or whether it imposes a ‘disproportionate burden’; there are however a number of equality body decisions addressing complaints for the non-provision of reasonable accommodation.

A 2006 decision of the equality body regarding accommodation for dyslectic pupils in exams dealt with the issue from a perspective other than the economic burden resulting for the party providing the accommodation. In the case of the dyslectic student, the considerations posed by the Education ministry were connected to the credibility and prestige of the exam and to avoid giving the dyslectic pupil an unfair advantage over other pupils.

The equality body's decision, based on the practices followed abroad and on international reports on dyslexia, was that in order to give the dyslectic pupil an equal opportunity to compete in the exam, it was necessary to allow him the use of means additional to the mere extra time of 30 minutes at the exam.²¹⁹

In 2007, the equality body found that the policy of the Ministry of Education to transfer public education teachers based solely on the needs of the service without reference to the existence or not of any disability, and disregarding the complainant's need to work in a stable and safe environment amounts to indirect discrimination on the ground of disability.²²⁰

A decision of the Equality body in 2008 pursuant to a complaint for lack of reasonable accommodation to facilitate exams for candidates with a disability for appointment in the public service found that the facilitation offered (extra 30 minutes which were deducted from the candidate's break) was not sufficient to create conditions of true equality for the complainant to compete with the other candidates, because the principle of reasonable accommodation is founded upon the premise that the measure must ensure equality in opportunity and not in the result.²²¹

Another complaint investigated by the equality body was submitted by a private sector employee suffering from multiple sclerosis who had initially been granted by her employer two afternoons off in order to undergo physiotherapy, which arrangement was subsequently revoked by the employer on the justification that the workload had increased and her services were needed full time. When the complainant expressed her inability to follow the full time schedule required, the employer fired her, claiming that the previous arrangement which allowed her to take two afternoons off was temporary, privileged and discretionary and could thus be revoked at any time. The equality body found that the employer has an obligation in law to adopt all necessary measures which will allow or facilitate the person to continue exercising the duties of his/her position provided there is no disproportionate burden for the employer and that the company's allegation that the arrangement of taking two afternoons off was 'discretionary' could not be accepted. Invoking the ECtHR decision in Thlimmenos v. Greece,²²² the decision stressed that there can be no issue of 'privileged' treatment of a person with the disability, since the treatment of persons without a disability in relation to persons with a disability cannot be the same, if equality is to be attained.²²³ The decision did not address the issue of the actual cost to the employer arising out of the two afternoons off claimed by the complainant and whether this was disproportionate or not, presumably because it did not find that the cost would be disproportionate.

In 2009, a complaint was submitted to the equality body by a job applicant who suffered from chondroplasia, as a result of which she was short, and whose job application was rejected as a result of her appearance. The equality body concluded that the employer had an obligation to place files in shelves which would be accessible by the complainant and/or provide a ladder to enable her to reach files in high shelves, so as to enable her to carry out her work duties.²²⁴

In June 2009 the Ministry of Education asked the Equality Body to provide an opinion as to whether a reduction of teaching hours, requested by teachers with disabilities, should be viewed as reasonable accommodation or whether it may be deemed as casting a disproportionate burden on the employer. The Equality Body responded that the reduction in teaching hours can constitute a reasonable accommodation measure, provided that the symptoms of the disability render teaching painful or exhausting.

On the issue of the proportionality of the burden on the employer, the Equality Body pointed to the possibility of the state securing funding from the European Social Fund in order to finance such a measure.²²⁵

The Code of Conduct on disability discrimination at the workplace issued by the Equality Body in September 2010 provides that the duty to provide reasonable accommodation is premised upon the principle that the measure must ensure equality in opportunity and not in the result, therefore the measure must be such so as to offer the person with disability the same opportunity as all other persons, e.g. persons with arthritis applying for the position of a typist must be given a special keyboard in order to be able to compete with the other applicants on the typing speed. Also persons with a disability who take exam for the purposes of a selection procedure for a job must be given such facilities so as to enable them to compete with the non-disabled candidates on equal terms. The employer's obligation to provide reasonable accommodation affects regulations or criteria set by the employer as well as the way in which the workplace is organized (e.g. offering a wheelchair user the chance to work on the ground floor of a building where this is available). The Code offers a non-exhaustive list of guidelines on reasonable accommodation measures: changes or adaptations to the building infrastructure (ramps and toilets for wheelchair users, Braille language on the buttons in the elevators etc); re-allocation of duties amongst employees so as to allocate to employees with disabilities duties they can perform; transfer to another job position if available; sick leave for the purposes of therapy; vocational training including training related to a person's disability e.g. use of new technologies or new equipment or logistics that can upgrade a disabled person's skills; facilitating the participation in trade unions; the upgrading of existing equipment; other forms of support or assistance.

- b) Does national law provide for a duty to provide a reasonable accommodation for people with disabilities in areas outside employment? Does the definition of “disproportionate burden” in this context, as contained in legislation and developed in case law, differ in any way from the definition used with regard to employment?

The law provides for a rather vague and toothless obligation to provide reasonable accommodation for persons with disability beyond the workplace: in the right to independent living, the right to diagnosis and prevention of disability, personal support with assistive equipment, accessibility to housing, buildings, streets, the environment and public transport, education, information and communication through special means, services for social and economic integration, vocational training, employment in the open market;²²⁶ in the supply of goods and services, including the facilitation of accessibility for safe and comfortable use of such services;²²⁷ in transport;²²⁸ and telecommunications.²²⁹ The reasonableness of the measures which the law requires to be taken for the aforesaid areas is to be determined by the cost, the financial sources of the person who is obliged to take these measures, and if these measures are to be taken by the state then the financial situation of the state considering its other obligations, the contribution of the state or of other sources (if any) towards the cost of the measures and the socio-economic situation of the person with the disability affected.²³⁰

‘Disproportionate burden’ does not appear in this provision, although it is inferred from the references to “the financial resources of the person obliged to take the measures”, “the public economic situation and other obligations of the state” and the contribution of public or private donations to the cost of the measures, all of which are to be taken into consideration in determining whether the cost is “reasonable” (and therefore imperative) or not.

By contrast, in the field of employment, following an amendment introduced in 2007, an obligation is imposed on the employer to take reasonable measures subject only to the condition that the measure does not lead to disproportionate burden for the employer.²³¹ According to this provision, a measure is not ‘disproportionate’ (and is therefore obligatory) when it is sufficiently balanced with measures taken in the framework of state policy in favour of persons with disability. As evidence of the fact that the lawmaker considered employment far more seriously than the other fields, even prior to the enactment of the aforesaid 2007 amendment, the consideration of the socio-economic situation of the person with the disability affected, in order to determine whether a measure was reasonable or not, did not apply to the field of employment.

²³¹ Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)2000 as amended by Law No. 72(I) of 2007, article 5(1A).

The law provides a rather vague obligation to take reasonable measures to ensure access for persons with disability to integrated education in accordance with their needs.²³² Furthermore, an amendment to the Law for the Carrying out of Pancyprrian School Exams N. 22(I)/2006 introduced in 2007 provides that extra 30 minutes “and/ or other possible facilities” are granted to pupils with special needs at examinations following a request submitted to and processed individually by a multi-disciplinary committee.

There are a number of equality body decisions confirming the right of persons with disability to reasonable accommodation in education. In 2006, for instance, the equality body produced a rather comprehensive report, pursuant to a number of complaints, for the lack of suitable accommodation for dyslexic children in exams, which places them in a less favourable position to non-dyslexic children. The decision found that the Education Ministry’s practice of providing only additional examination time, was discriminatory towards dyslexic children; and also that the two national laws regulating the issue of exams²³³ introduced indirect discrimination on the ground of special needs in the field of education. The decision asks that the two laws in question be revised. Interestingly enough, the decision of the equality body does not cite the relevant provision in the disability law (mentioned at the beginning of this paragraph) but instead invokes a number of other laws ratifying international Conventions: the Law ratifying UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (art. 3, 23 and 28 of the Convention), the European Social Charter; and Regulations on the Training and Education of Children with Special Needs 1999-2001; Law on Combating Racial and Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) 2004 (Art. 6(1) and 39(1)), perhaps in knowledge that the relevant provision in the disability law does not create the mandatory regime needed to support this decision. Indeed, in 2007 the Law for the Carrying out of Pancyprrian School Exams N. 22(I)/2006 was revised to provide that extra 30 minutes “and/ or other possible facilities” are granted to persons with special needs who have obtained the relevant confirmation from the Examinations Authority, which confirmation they must then produce to the invigilators at the time of the exam.²³⁴ These facilities to be granted are subject to the approval of a committee set up by this law and comprising of the following public servants: a representative of the Examinations Authority who presides, the person in charge of Special Education, a representative of the Educational Psychology Department, a representative of the Counselling and Vocational Guidance Department. The provision of facilities must: aim at securing the established rights of persons with special needs during the examinations, in order to balance off their disability or special problem they are facing; must be within the “incontestable” nature of the exam; not give advantage to any candidate. Each request for facilities will be looked at separately by the Committee which has the right (note: but not the obligation) to invite two educationalists -experts in the field of the disability concerned, to assist in the evaluation of each individual request.

- c) Does failure to meet the duty of reasonable accommodation count as discrimination? Is there a justification defence? How does this relate to the prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination?

Although the law does not expressly provide that failure to meet the duty of reasonable accommodation amounts to discrimination, it is possible that this may be inferred from the wording used. In particular, article 5(1) of the law as amended in 2007²³⁵ states that the principle of equal treatment applies in the field of employment and for this purpose discrimination is prohibited. This provision is followed by the 2007 addition to the law of article 5(1)A which provides for the duty to provide reasonable accommodation so long as the burden on the employer is not disproportionate. The purpose of this duty is stated in article 5(1)A to ensure implementation of the principle of equal treatment.

Given that the sanctions foreseen by the law cover only actions or omissions amounting to direct or indirect discrimination,²³⁶ it follows that obligations which do not amount to discrimination are not punishable under this law. It is reasonable to infer that, since the duty to provide reasonable accommodation is now clearly worded as a mandatory obligation, then in order for the sanctions to apply, the failure to meet this duty should amount to discrimination.

In an effort to clarify the rather vague and evasive language of the law, the Code of Conduct on disability discrimination at the workplace issued by the Equality Body in 2010 explicitly provides that the employer's failure to adopt reasonable accommodation measures amounts to unlawful discrimination and is punishable with a fine or even imprisonment as all other forms of discrimination.

No case was ever tried by the Courts on reasonable accommodation. However, the decisions of the equality body on this issue consider the failure to meet this duty as discrimination prohibited by law, even before the 2007 change of the law. The complaint concerned a blind person working as a telephonist in the hospital, who was moved to a new hospital and had to cope with a more complicated and sophisticated telephone system, with more telephone lines and with a less favourable working schedule. The equality body decided that the hospital authorities ought to have transferred to the new post one of the other employees without a disability and to leave the blind employee at the post where he could cope. The report calls on the hospital authorities to explain, in a manner satisfactory to the equality body, why the employee had to be moved to the new hospital, failing which a decision would be issued against them by the equality body.²³⁷

Also, the equality body's decision in a case of reasonable accommodation for dyslectic pupils at school exams²³⁸ stated that the accommodation measures do not give the dyslectic student an advantage over other students, as the Education Ministry claimed, but merely serve to place the dyslectic student in an equal position with other students. In support of this, the Equality body cited the ECtHR decision in the case of Thlimmenos v. Greece which ruled that equal treatment can also mean the different treatment of unequal persons, from which it follows that in some cases failure to provide such measures, may indeed amount to discrimination. Along similar lines, a 2009 decision of the equality body on a complaint from the representative of the Maronite community regarding the inadequate arrangements at the Maronite school, found that special treatment involves deviations from the principle of equality, which take the form of positive measures or special rights targeting a certain group aiming at the elimination of discrimination. The decision criticised the line of argumentation of the Ministry of Education which offered the Maronite community only equal treatment before the law, adding that the protection of national minorities must go beyond that, to recognise and promote rights of a collective character.²³⁹

d) Has national law (including case law) implemented the duty to provide reasonable accommodation in respect of any of the other grounds (e.g. religion)?

Although the law does not confer the right of reasonable accommodation on the ground of religion, nor is such a right recognized and respected in practice, an Equality Body report of December 2005 following a complaint on behalf of a Jehovah's Witness pupil against the behavior of the religious instruction teacher towards her, criticized the practice of restricting pupils exempted from the religious lesson into the library and recommended that more creative occupation be sought for the exempted pupils. In 2010 another Equality Body report criticised the procedure for exemption of pupils from the religious class and for the fact that the handling of the exemption request by the school led to the stigmatisation of the student-complainant, as she was for several months isolated from her classmates.²⁴⁰ In its reports, the equality body does not cite the anti-discrimination laws, which clearly do not impose a duty to provide reasonable accommodation on the ground of religion, but articles from the Cypriot Constitution; Article 14 of the International Convention for the rights of Child and Article 9 of the ECHR.²⁴¹

During 2009 the ombudsman reported receiving complaints from two Muslim inmates in the Central Prison that they were unable to practice their religion in prison, however by the time the complaints came to be investigated the complainants had been released and therefore no investigation was possible.

e) Does national law clearly provide for the shift of the burden of proof, when claiming the right to reasonable accommodation?

Yes, even though no express reference is made in the burden of proof provision to that effect. The said provision states that the burden of proof is reversed in civil proceedings in relation to discriminatory treatment in employment.²⁴² Given that the amendment in the law introduced in 2007 in order to create a mandatory obligation for employers to provide reasonable accommodation begins with the phrase “In order to secure the principle of equal treatment for persons with disability”, it may be assumed that failure to provide such accommodation (when the burden is not “disproportionate”) amounts to “discriminatory treatment” which causes the burden of proof to shift from the claimant to the respondent.

- f) Does national law require services available to the public, buildings and infrastructure to be designed and built in a disability-accessible way? If so, could and has a failure to comply with such legislation be relied upon in a discrimination case based on the legislation transposing Directive 2000/78?

Article 6(2)(d)(ii) of the Law on Persons with Disabilities provides that the failure to carry out alterations to services or facilities which renders their use by a person with a disability unjustifiably difficult does not amount to equal treatment and is therefore prohibited by law. In addition, article 4(2) of the same law establishes a list of rights for persons with disabilities which are, however, implemented with the adoption of ‘reasonable measures’ to the extent that local economic and other conditions allow’.²⁴³

The definition of reasonable measure²⁴⁴ is so wide that it falls short of creating a mandatory regime and once the accused party proves that one of the considerations listed in 9 is in place, then no binding obligation arises to respect the rights listed in article 4(2). Article 4(2)(c) of the law provides for the right to accessibility to housing, buildings, streets and generally the natural environment and to public transport. This provision also falls under the ambit of article 9(1) in the sense that the obligations created hereby are easily discharged through the adoption of ‘reasonable measures’, the scope of which is so wide that it does not create a mandatory regime.

The accessibility of persons with disabilities to public buildings is regulated by the Regulations on Streets and Buildings of 1999, which were issued by virtue of Article 19 of the Streets and Buildings law. Regulation 61G defines a person with disability as a person facing temporary or permanent difficulty in accessing a building or a street due to physical weakness or deficiency; obviously the definition is intended to be wide enough to secure accessibility to built infrastructure not only for persons with a disability in the narrow sense of the term but persons generally encountering obstacles in access, such as the elderly.

The regulations apply to public buildings as well as to those buildings where entry to the public is allowed, to commercial centres, to buildings which include shops and/or offices, to educational institutions, clinics, doctors' offices and generally to any building which the competent authority decides that these Regulations should apply. The Regulations set the minimum necessary specifications for the erection of all the aforesaid buildings and aim at securing the comfortable access of all persons with disability to the main entrance of such buildings and to the spaces within such buildings. The Regulations provide analytically the construction specifications for ramps to the main entrance, for the pavements, the staircases, the common use corridors, the elevators, the lavatories and other spaces where the public may go in, including the parking areas. However, failure to comply with these regulations does not amount to discrimination.

In January 2010 a disability organization (the Cyprus Organisation of Paraplegics) was informed by the Nicosia municipality that some entertainment establishments operating in Nicosia had been exempted from the obligation to have accessible building infrastructure. By a letter dated 22.01.2010 the NGO asked the municipality to provide a list with the establishments that were exempted, the reasons for the exemption and the details of the body within the municipality that decided for these exemptions. However until the time of writing, the municipality did not respond to the NGO's letter. On 23.02.2011 the NGO applied to the municipality again expressing its disappointment over the municipality's lack of response and reminded that a law that came into force in 2006 established the confederation of disability organizations as a social partner that must be consulted on all issues affecting persons with disabilities. The said law remains to a large extent an empty letter, as the disability movement is not consulted on many policy decisions affecting them.

An equality body decision in 2009 regarding access to a disabled toilet in the common areas of the building where the complainant resided stressed that the law does not set any preconditions which must be met in order for persons facing mobility obstacles to have access to communal toilets, nor does it require such persons to produce any documents to prove their disability. The management company of the building had asked the complainant to produce a number of documents to prove his disability before they grant him with permission to use the disabled communal toilet.²⁴⁵

g) Does national law contain a general duty to provide accessibility for people with disabilities by anticipation? If so, how is accessibility defined, in what fields (employment, social protection, goods and services, transport, housing, education, etc.) and who is covered by this obligation? On what grounds can a failure to provide accessibility be justified?

The obligation to provide accessibility by anticipation exists only for public buildings (i.e. buildings open to the public) and only for certain features of a building, as detailed in the previous section.

²⁴⁵ Decision Reference number A.K.I. 91/2008, dated 14.05.2009.

Not all needs of all disabilities are covered; for instance there is no provision in the regulations regarding pavements and regarding the location of buildings by persons with visual impairment. Also there are no clear provisions for accessibility to the internal spaces of a building.

There are also problems with the implementation of these regulations, because supervision of compliance is lacking and although architectural plans may be submitted in compliance with the regulations, the building may at the end not be constructed in accordance with the specifications approved, as there is no compliance mechanism to ensure that the approved specifications are met. Another serious discrepancy is that buildings housing governmental services are exempted from these regulations and do not have to be (and usually are not) accessible to all persons with disabilities. Also, the regulations do not cover buildings constructed prior to the date of coming into force of the regulations (1999). In 2003, the Technical Committee for the Facilitation of Persons with Reduced Mobility (a NGO consisting of persons with disability as well as persons with technical expertise-architects, civil engineers etc) has drafted and submitted a proposal to the Ministry of Interior for the comprehensive revision of the regulations in order to cover all aspects of accessibility and fill the gaps but, due to bureaucratic obstacles, no significant progress has been made so far.²⁴⁶

The Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(l)/2000 contains a number of rather vague provisions regarding accessibility, although it does not provide for any enforcement mechanism:

- Article 4(2)(e) of this law provides for the right to access information and communication with special means where this is necessary for special groups of persons.
- Article 4(2)(f) provides for the right to services of social and economic integration, vocational assessment and guidance, vocational training and occupation in the open labour market.
- With regard to goods and services, article 6(1) establishes the right to equal treatment in the field of provision of goods, services and facilities and describes the type of treatment which amounts to discrimination. This includes a reason referring to a person's disability which is not applicable to another person²⁴⁷ and treatment which is not justified.²⁴⁸
- Article 6(2) lists examples of what does not amount to equal treatment, which include the denial to supply services, the provision of services of a lower standard and the provision of goods and services with substandard preconditions.

²⁴⁸ Law on Persons with Disability 127(l)/2000, article 6(1)(b).

- The right to accessibility to public transport is provided for in article 7(1) of the law, whilst accessibility to telecommunications and information is covered by article 8(1).

The obligations arising under articles 4, 6 and 8 above can be discharged with the adoption of “reasonable measures” to the extent that local economic and other conditions allow (article 9(1)). By their very nature, most obligations are cast upon the state although some of them are cast also on the private sector. The failure to discharge these obligations becomes actionable only when the accused person cannot invoke one of the factors listed in section 9(1) of the law (see paragraph 2.6(a) hereinabove), which factors must be taken into consideration in order to determine whether or not a measure is reasonable (and therefore obligatory).

Article 7 is implemented through the introduction of regulations issued by the Council of Ministers following the recommendation of the Ministry of Labour and the Ministry of Transport and Public Works. No such regulations have been issued so far and the public means of transport are not accessible to persons with disability. The Pancyprian Organisation of the Blind has repeatedly lobbied the Ministry of Transport on this issue and has managed to secure satisfaction for some but not all its claims.²⁴⁹ The measure of special seats for persons with disability near the door was introduced, however due to a new transport scheme which introduced a large number of new buses into the transport network, this measure has not as yet been implemented for all buses. There are also plans to introduce voice warnings in buses by 2013.

- h) Please explain briefly the existing national legislation concerning people with disabilities (beyond the simple prohibition of discrimination). Does national law provide for special rights for people with disabilities?*

The Law on Persons with Disability 127(I)/2000 provides for a long list of rights beyond the minimum standards set by the Employment Equality Directive some of which, however, are subject to the special regime created by article 9(1), which is explained in the previous section. In particular, the law provides for the right to: independent living, for full integration to the community and for equality of participation in economic and social life;²⁵⁰ prompt diagnosis of the disability, intervention and prevention of its consequences, provision of medical and pharmaceutical care, rehabilitation of functions including the provision and training in the use of added and corrective limbs, as well as psychological and other support of the person and his/her family;²⁵¹ personal support with auxiliary equipment and other means and services which assist a person in everyday living and work, with an interpreter or an escort as well as with any other required support where this is deemed necessary;²⁵² accessibility to housing, buildings, streets and generally to the natural environment and in public transport and other means of transportation;²⁵³ access to special education according to their needs;²⁵⁴ access to information and communication with special means where this is deemed necessary;²⁵⁵ services for social and economic integration, vocational assessment and orientation, vocational training and occupation in the open labour market;²⁵⁶ a dignified standard of living and where this is necessary through economic benefits and social services;²⁵⁷ the creation of personal and family life;²⁵⁸ participation in cultural, athletic, social, religious and other recreational activities.²⁵⁹

As stated above, the rights set out in this article are, according to article 9(1) of the law, to be implemented through the taking of “reasonable measures”. The term “reasonable measures” is defined in article 9(2) to mean “measures provided in any other law or regulation” and which are to be adopted taking into consideration the nature and cost involved, the financial situation of the party required to take this measure, and if that is the state then the situation of public finances, any public or other contributions towards the cost of the measure, and the financial situation of the person with disability concerned. Article 6(1) establishes the right to equal treatment in the provision of goods, facilities and services, unless the unequal treatment is “justified”. Article 6(2) defines what does not constitute ‘equal treatment’ for the purpose of this provision, and is therefore prohibited, as follows: refusal to provide services; services of a lower standard; provision of goods and services with substandard conditions; the failure to carry out changes in services or facilities which render their use by a person with disability difficult or impossible. Such changes may include the creation of suitable accessibility features for comfortable and safe use of the services or facilities; the use of special means, equipment or persons for the facilitation of communication and information to persons with disability; the use of specialized means, equipment and facilities in places where services are offered, such as schools, hospitals, clinics etc.

All the rights created by article 6 are, once more, subject to the ‘reasonable measure’ restriction of article 9(1). Also, the article itself limits its applicability to cases where there are no reasons rendering the implementation of equal treatment ‘unjustified’.

Article 7 provides that all means of public transport must comply with regulations in force regarding the entry into and transport of persons with disability. This provision is not subject to the ‘reasonable measure’ restrictions of article 9(1); however, as stated in the previous section, this obligation becomes operative only with the introduction of regulations which have not been introduced yet. It should also be added, however, that the public transport network in Cyprus is rather poor and limited and not many persons use it.

²⁵⁹ Law on Persons with Disability 127(I)/2000, article 4(2)(i).

Article 7A provides for the issue of a special parking ticket that secures preferential parking for persons with disability.

Article 8(1) provides that the competent governmental services must proceed “within a short period of time” to the installation of a special telephone service for persons with a hearing disability so as to enable these persons to communicate in the same manner as persons without such disability. Article 8(2) provides that there must be public telecommunication means accessible to persons with disability including wheelchair users. Article 8(3) provides that television stations must offer sign language interpretation to the news program once a day. The obligations created under article 8 are again subject to the restrictions of Article 9(1); this means that if the cost of the measures is disproportionate given the financial situation of the party required to adopt them and there is no contribution towards the cost from the state or from other sources, or if the financial situation of the person with disability is good, then no duty arises to adopt this measure.

By virtue of a law that came into force in 2006, the national confederation of organizations of persons with disability KYSOA became a social partner of the state in all matters pertaining to disability. Under the same law, consultation with KYSOA became imperative for all governmental departments dealing with disability and KYSOA became a receiver of an annual state grant for its running expenses.²⁶⁰ The equality body has also recognized the significant role which KYSOA can play and has therefore recommended in a recent decision that the Law on the Assessment of Candidates for Appointment in the Public Service be amended so as to provide for reasonable accommodation for candidates with a disability, after consultation with KYSOA.²⁶¹ However, in a consultation which took place between KYSOA and the government regarding the introduction of quotas in favour of persons with disabilities in the wider public sector in 2009, the vast majority of the views and objections of KYSOA were ignored.

2.7 Sheltered or semi-sheltered accommodation/employment

a) To what extent does national law make provision for sheltered or semi-sheltered accommodation/employment for workers with disabilities?

The closest practice to what is known as sheltered employment is the institution of the ‘sheltered workshops’ known as KEAA (Centres for Vocational Rehabilitations for the Disabled) operated by the Ministry of Labour, whose role is to provide ‘training’ and ‘quasi-employment’ to persons with a disability. The goods produced at the workshops are bought by governmental agencies²⁶² and NGOs.

²⁶⁰ Law on Consultation Process of State and Other Services on Issues concerning Persons with Disability N. 143(I)/2006, dated 3.11.2006.

²⁶¹ 08.10.2008, Ref. A.K.I. 37/2008, reported under section 3.13 above

The institution of ‘Supported Employment’ provides since 1996 supported employment for persons with intellectual disability. The main actor involved is the Committee for the Protection of Mentally Retarded Persons and Service for the Welfare of the Disabled of the Ministry of Labour and volunteer organisations.²⁶³ It covers SMEs in the private sector but mostly large companies in the private sector, with the support of civil society. In terms of funding, 70% comes from the Service for the Welfare of the Disabled (Ministry of Labour) and 30% by the implementing volunteer organisation. This program offers to persons with intellectual disability²⁶⁴ the possibility for socialization and integration in the real labour market with personalised support. Evaluations of the program which are carried out every few years show an increasing satisfaction of all actors concerned with the institution and an increasing independence of persons with intellectual disability from public benefit and from their families. Sixty per cent of the persons so employed have stated that they were very happy with their work, even though the pay was very small (Euros 1,70 per hour). The main weakness is that very few have found employment in the service industry, which according to the organizers, renders it questionable whether the preferences of the persons with intellectual disability were taken into account. Also, the pay is extremely low and below the poverty line. Some families have discouraged their disabled member from participating in the scheme as this would result in losing their state benefit, which is often a higher amount than the remuneration received at supported employment.

b) Would such activities be considered to constitute employment under national law-including for the purposes of application of the anti-discrimination law ?

There is no employment relationship between each KEAA (Centre for Vocational Rehabilitations for the Disabled) and the individual person with disabilities working there. The persons who work at the Centres are primarily treated as ‘trainees’ and as such they are paid a small amount termed as ‘training allowance’ for participating in the workshops. The amount of the ‘training allowance’ varies according to the marital status of the person (married persons get more).

The income derived from these workshops is termed as ‘production allowance’ and depends on the profits of each of the craft workshop.²⁶⁵ The vast majority of persons occupied at KEAA are already receivers of welfare (disability) benefit.²⁶⁶

²⁶⁶ Information from Mr. Aggelides, Official, Ministry of Labour, 23.1.2005.

In the case of supported employment for persons with intellectual disability, an employment relationship does exist and strictly speaking the law transposing the disability component of The Employment Equality Directive applies. It is nevertheless the author's view that the special circumstances of this type of employment will be taken into consideration in adjudicating a claim under this law. Many of the terms of the employment, such as the salary, the working hours, the availability of supportive equipment are part of the scheme and can only be challenged if the scheme itself is challenged. However there are policy considerations involved in challenging a scheme that is in itself a good practice. Participation in the scheme on the part of the enterprises is optional and few companies have enrolled, so one can anticipate the consequences of challenging the scheme as discriminatory. Having said that, the terms of the scheme are undoubtedly discriminatory; the salary which is well below the poverty line, was presumably fixed at such low levels having in mind the consideration (or the assumption) that persons with intellectual disability would be unable to find employment outside this scheme. Also, if one is to apply the anti-discrimination law to the letter, there is no justification in restricting the application of this scheme only to the companies that willingly participate in it: a person with intellectual disability that can perform work that is equal to that performed by other workers should not only receive the same pay but should also be entitled to access job positions in companies outside the scheme, where failure to hire them would amount to discrimination. Judging from how the different bodies approach the subject of non-discrimination, one could perhaps conclude that the Courts would be quick to reject claims for discrimination, on the basis that this is not a normal employment situation as foreseen by the legislator, whilst the Equality Body would attempt to mediate in order to improve the scheme with recommendations for more equal and just provisions.

3 PERSONAL AND MATERIAL SCOPE

3.1 Personal scope

3.1.1 EU and non-EU nationals (Recital 13 and Article 3(2) Directive 2000/43 and Recital 12 and Article 3(2) Directive 2000/78)

Are there residence or citizenship/nationality requirements for protection under the relevant national laws transposing the Directives?

Protocol 12 to the ECHR guarantees “the enjoyment of all rights set forth by law” without discrimination, inter alia, of ‘national or ethnic origin’. Under Law N.42 (1)/2004 which appoints the Ombudsman as the equality body, there are no residence or citizenship/nationality prerequisites in the body’s mandate in order to extend protection under the relevant national laws transposing the Directives. The Equality Body is empowered to promote equality of the enjoyment of rights and freedoms safeguarded by the Cypriot Constitution (Part II) or by the Conventions ratified by Cyprus and referred to in the Law²⁶⁷ irrespective of race, community, language, colour, religion, political or other beliefs, national or ethnic origin.²⁶⁸ The Directives’ exception on difference of treatment based on nationality (article 3(2)) has been incorporated verbatim into the national legislation transposing the Directives. We therefore have a situation where as regards the Equality Body’s mandate nationality is a protected ground, but as regards the scope of the laws transposing the two Directives, the exception as regards nationality applies. Given that the decisions of the Equality Body may be used in Court in order to obtain a judgement, one may argue that nationality may also be a protected ground in Court decisions. In its decisions, the equality body has made use of its extended mandate and considered nationality discrimination as prohibited by international laws; on some occasions nationality and ethnic origin has been used interchangeably, in the sense that whilst the case at stake was clearly one of nationality discrimination, the decision would also invoke the provisions of the laws transposing the anti-discrimination directives.

Article 32 of the Constitution stipulates that “nothing in this Part²⁶⁹ contained shall preclude the Republic from regulating by law any matter relating to Aliens in accordance with International law.” This provision, combined with the wide provisions of Cypriot immigration law, is often implemented with a tendency to considerably enlarge the scope of state discretion.

²⁶⁹ Part II of the constitution contains the human rights and fundamental freedoms.

This wide margin of discretion allows for discrimination to occur and immigration officers in Cyprus have been widely criticised by the Second Report of the European Commission on Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) on this score,²⁷⁰ by the Equality Body,²⁷¹ by NGOs and by members of parliament.²⁷² In any case, there is a strong body of opinion by authoritative legal scholars that the correct interpretation of Article 32 does not allow for differential treatment of non-Cypriots when it comes to human rights as this provision (a) merely incorporates international law within the corpus of Cyprus law²⁷³ and (b) that such differential treatment would most likely amount to a violation of Article 28²⁷⁴ and other international treaties ratified by the Republic which, under Article 169, prevail over domestic legislation.²⁷⁵ The provisions regarding the transposition of the anti-discrimination acquis do not refer only to citizens or legally resident persons, but to all persons. In support of this argument there is also Protocol 12 to the ECHR.

Complaints by EU citizens are often filed with the Equality body alleging nationality discrimination, possibly reflecting the fact that these persons are more familiar with the Equality Body procedure than most third country nationals. On several instances, the Equality body found that discrimination did indeed exist and recommended to the competent authorities to take measures to rectify the situation.²⁷⁶ Some examples of such decisions concern the failure of the authorities to advise EU citizens of their need to register themselves in the electoral rolls in order to be allowed to vote in municipal elections; the request of the road transport department for EU nationals to present immigration documents evidencing 6 months' stay in Cyprus in order to acquire a Cypriot driving license; the University's rejection of a job application because the applicant was a Greek national; the pre-condition of good knowledge of the Greek language in order for managers to be granted a permit to operate a tourist business.

²⁷⁶ The Equality Body considers discrimination against EU citizens as falling within the scope of its mandate and often uses the grounds of race/ethnic origin and nationality interchangeably.

During 2009 the equality body issued its report on a complaint from a Greek actor permanently residing and working in Cyprus since 1973, against the Cypriot Ministry of Education for refusing to accept his candidacy for an honorary annual grant paid to persons of the letters and the arts for their lifetime contribution. From the Equality Body's investigation it emerged that the Ministry's refusal was based upon a Council of Ministers' decision of 2000 which restricted these honorary pensions to Cypriot citizens. The Equality Body wrote to the Ministry of Education expressing the view that the said policy reasonably causes feelings of unfairness and discriminatory treatment and that it is doubtful whether it complies with the anti-discrimination legislation. In compliance with the Equality Body's position, the Ministry of Education promptly submitted a proposal to the Council of Ministers to amend the said policy by removing the requirement of Cypriot nationality for the candidates of the honorary artists' pension. The Council of Ministers accepted the proposal and amended the said policy in May 2009 by removing the restriction of Cypriot nationality.²⁷⁷

3.1.2 Natural persons and legal persons (Recital 16 Directive 2000/43)

Does national law distinguish between natural persons and legal persons, either for purposes of protection against discrimination or liability for discrimination?

Both legal and natural persons may apply to the Courts or to the Equality body claiming discrimination. Article 7(1) of Law N.59(I)/2004, Article 9A of Law N.127(I)/2000 as amended by N.57(I)/2004 and Article 11 of Law N. 58(I) provide that any physical or legal person who considers that he/she has been discriminated on the prohibited grounds may apply to the competent courts (i.e. Labour Tribunal, District Court or Supreme Court) depending on the subject matter and the procedure of each the case, or to the Equality body.

In all matters concerning employment, since employees can only be physical persons and not legal persons, it follows that all rights arising under the law for employees are applicable only to natural persons. However, under Article 14 of Law N.58(I)/2004 and Article 9D of Law N.127(I)/2000 as amended, physical persons may be represented by legal persons in proceedings before the Court or before the Equality body claiming discrimination: "employees' organisations or other organisations" with legal standing or a legitimate interest can, with the consent of their members, act on their behalf. Similarly the Racial Equality Law N.59(I)/2004, Article 12 provides that organisations or other legal personalities, which have as their constitutional aim to combat discrimination on the ground racial or ethnic origin", and with legal standing or a legitimate interest can, with the consent of their members act on their behalf.

The fines which the Court may impose on physical or legal persons also vary. Natural person may be fined with up to 4,000 Cyprus pounds (6,835 Euros) and/or six months imprisonment or both.²⁷⁸

If a legal person is found guilty of discrimination, the managing director, chairman, director, secretary or other privileged officer of the legal personality or organisation shall be held guilty for the actions of the legal person and fined with up to 4,000 Cyprus pounds (6,835 Euros) and/or six months imprisonment or both, if it is established that the offence is committed with their consent or collaboration or mere tolerance. In addition, the legal person can be fined up with up to 7,000 Cyprus pounds (11,962 Euros).²⁷⁹ There is also a provision for 'gross negligence' with fines up to 2,000 Cyprus pounds (3,417 Euros) for individuals and 4,000 Cyprus pounds (6,835 Euros) for legal persons.²⁸⁰

3.1.3 Scope of liability

What is the scope of liability for discrimination (including harassment and instruction to discriminate)? Specifically, can employers or (in the case of racial or ethnic origin) service providers (e.g. landlords, schools, hospitals) be held liable for the actions of employees? Can they be held liable for actions of third parties (e.g. tenants, clients or customers)? Can the individual harasser or discriminator (e.g. co-worker or client) be held liable? Can trade unions or other trade/professional associations be held liable for actions of their members?

The scope of liability for discrimination is only defined in the context of the responsibilities of organisations or legal personalities (see 3.1.2 above) and not in the context of employer's liability or service providers' liability etc. Harassment and instruction to discriminate are recognised as forms of prohibited discrimination, following the exact wording of the Directives, for all five grounds covered by the Directives.

Regarding the liability of employer and of service-providers (e.g. landlords, schools, hospitals) the law does not specifically provide a detailed description for the consequences of the actions of employees. There are sanctions for individuals as well as responsible officers working within organisations and legal personalities, who are presumably found guilty taking into account all relevant factors such as the nature, severity, intensity, repetition, knowledge of the discrimination, the injury and vulnerability of the victim etc.

²⁷⁸ For disability Article 5(4) of the Law N. 127(I)/2000 as amended by Law N.72(I)/2007; for employment N.58(I)/2004, Article15; for racial discrimination Law N.59(I)/2004, Article13.

²⁷⁹ For disability Article 5(5) of the Law N. 127(I)/2000 as amended by Law N.72(I)/2007; for employment N.58(I)/2004, Article15(1) and 15(2); for racial discrimination Law N.59(I)/2004, Article13(1) and 13(2).

²⁸⁰ For disability, Articles 5(4) and 5(5) of the Law N. 127(I)/2000 as amended by Law N.72(I)/2007; for employment N.58(I)/2004, Article15(3); for racial discrimination Law N.59(I)/2004, Article13(3).

The individual harasser or discriminator (e.g. co-worker or client) can be held liable as there are provisions for sanctions against individuals acting on their own. Individuals who have a position of authority within organisations can be sanctioned (fined and /or imprisoned). Legal personalities or organisations can also be fined. Trade unions or other trade/professional associations can be held liable for actions of their members to the extent they are considered to have acted as an organisation or legal person, as referred to above.²⁸¹

3.2 Material Scope

3.2.1 Employment, self-employment and occupation

Does national legislation apply to all sectors of public and private employment and occupation, including contract work, self-employment, military service, holding statutory office?

National legislation transposing the two Directives²⁸² applies to all sectors of public and private employment and occupation,²⁸³ including contract work, self-employment, holding statutory office, with the exception of military service. The scope of Law N. 58(l)/2004 (transposing the Employment Equality Directive minus the ground of disability which is covered by other laws) includes conditions of access to employment, to self-employment or to occupation, including selection criteria, recruitment conditions and promotion; access to vocational guidance and training, including practical work experience; employment and working conditions, including dismissals and pay; membership in an organisation of workers or employers, or any organisation whose members carry on a particular profession, including the benefits provided for by such organisations.

In the case of military service, article 8(4) of the same law provides an exception to the prohibition of age discrimination, where the fixing of an age limit is justified by the nature and the duties of the position.

²⁸² Law N.58(l)/2004, Article 4(a); Law N.57(l)/2004, Article 5(a)

²⁸³ Following English common law, there is a sharp distinction in terms of employment rights between 'employees' and 'self-employed'/ independent contractors. Employees are subject to direction and control and there is an 'employment relationship' between the employee and the employer, which is one of a contract of employment, with all the rights provided for by the law. The test of 'control, dependence and direction of work' is the one used to distinguish between 'employees' and self-employed'/ independent contractors. Employees are generally supervised and directed by others; they have a place and time of work, receive wages and have a contract of employment. A 'contract of employment' is sharply distinguished from a 'contract for services' as the latter does not provide for any employment rights guaranteed by labour law. Part-timers are employees and enjoy the same rights as other full-time employees based on the principle of 'proportionality' [Law N. 76(l)/2002 (14/06/2002) which transposed Directive 1997/81).

The new law enacted in 2009 introducing quotas in favour of persons with disability in the wider public sector excludes those sections of the public service where “all physical, mental or intellectual restrictions must necessarily be absent”²⁸⁴, which are the army, the police, the fire department and the prisons.

The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law²⁸⁵ which sets out the mandate of the equality body, provides that the implementation of Protocol 12 is within such mandate and therefore the equality body is empowered to apply this to military service issues.

This law also provides that the equality body is vested with powers to tackle discrimination in the areas of employment, access to vocational training, working conditions including pay, membership of trade unions or other associations, social insurance and medical care, education and access to goods and services including housing, as required by Article 3.1 of the Directives. Such discrimination is unlawful.

Both laws N.58(I)/2004 (Article 2) and N.57(I)/2004 (Article 2) define ‘employee’ as ‘any person who works or is trained in full time or part-time occupation, fixed time or permanent employment, continuous or otherwise, irrespective of the place of employment, including home employees but excluding self-employment.

Prior to the enactment of the 2004 laws, the fields of application provided in Cypriot law (Article 28 of Constitution and Article 5 of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination - ICERD) which refer to equal treatment irrespective of racial or ethnic origin extended only to some of the areas covered. Article 5 of the ICERD mentions the right to work, but not the conditions for access to employment, to self-employment and to occupation. With regard to 3.1 (b) of the Directive, Article 5 of ICERD provides for the right to training, whereas the Directive focuses on access to all types and to all levels of vocational guidance, (advanced) vocational training and retraining. A comparison between Article 5 of the ICERD and Article 3.1(c) of the Directive reveals that the former does not include employment and working conditions relating to dismissal. Article 5 of the ICERD limits itself to the right to form and join trade unions, whilst Article 3.1(d) of the Directives is broader in the types of organisation that one can be a member of or involved in and further includes the benefits provided by such organisation or association.

The scope of the anti-discrimination laws in Cyprus covers all the areas listed in the Directives.

In paragraphs 2.2.2 - 2.2.5, you should specify if each of the following areas is fully and expressly covered by national law for each of the grounds covered by the Directives.

²⁸⁴ Law introducing special provisions for the hiring of persons with a disabilities in the wider public sector 146(I)/2009, article 2.

²⁸⁵ Law N.42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004).

3.2.2 Conditions for access to employment, to self-employment or to occupation, including selection criteria, recruitment conditions and promotion, whatever the branch of activity and at all levels of the professional hierarchy (Article 3(1)(a)) Is the public sector dealt with differently to the private sector?

Despite the formal adoption of the four main laws on anti-discrimination, there are no provisions for the facilitation or improvement of conditions for access as required by Article 3(1) (a) of the Employment Equality Directive. There is no tradition of anti-discrimination and there are no specialist lawyers on the subject, nor are there any special mechanisms in the various Government departments created for the implementation of the above provisions. Save for a few initiatives on coordination and information by the Ministry of Justice, there are no measures to monitor and collect data on such matters.

The laws on discrimination apply equally to the public and private sector. A limited number of quotas in favour of persons with disability are in place in the public sector which are not found in the private sector. There are, at the same time, projects applying only to employment in the private sector. The Ministry of Labour is currently compiling two schemes, under co-funding from the European Social Fund and from the Cyprus government, for the promotion of integration of persons with disabilities in the labour market in the private sector: a scheme for payment of social insurance for employers in the private sector and for persons with disabilities employed by them; and a scheme for providing incentives to employers to employ persons with serious disability in the private sector. Under the same funding line, the Ministry of Labour is also promoting a scheme for the vocational training of certain persons with disability by NGOs.

3.2.3 Employment and working conditions, including pay and dismissals (Article 3(1)(c))

In respect of occupational pensions, how does national law ensure the prohibition of discrimination on all the grounds covered by Directive 2000/78 EC? NB: Case C-267/06 Maruko confirmed that occupational pensions constitute part of an employee's pay under Directive 2000/78 EC.

Note that this can include contractual conditions of employment as well as the conditions in which work is, or is expected to be, carried out.

Article 4(c) of Law N.58(I)/2004 (transposing the Employment Equality Directive minus disability) and Article 5 (1) of Law N.127(I)/2000 as amended by Law 57(I)/2004 (transposing the disability component of the Employment Equality Directive) prohibit discrimination in all fields including "working conditions, terms of employment, pay and dismissals", but nothing more is specified.

Given the participation of the social partners in collective bargaining and the shaping of collective agreements, the Cypriot tripartite system is expected to deal with such matters in the long term future,²⁸⁶ although in practice it has yet to happen. In the case of gender the process has just begun, so it is expected that the other five grounds will follow at some point in the future. However, the process of institutionalising the anti-discrimination principle will be a long one as evident from the reaction of the trade unions recorded in the report of the equality authority (one of the two bodies comprising the equality body) for the years 2007-2008 published in 2009: the report states that trade unions view the body's review of the terms of collective agreements as an attempt to limit trade union freedom.

Pensions

The Law on Pensions of 1997-2001, as amended, which regulates the payment of pensions to public employees contains no protection against discrimination. In fact, a decision of the equality body in 2009 has established that the Pensions Law itself contains discriminatory provisions, as it provides for less favourable terms for employees aged under 45 who want to take early retirement, compared to older employees.²⁸⁷ A Supreme Court decision of 2007²⁸⁸ found that the Pensions Law of 1967 (N.9/67) as amended by Law N.69(1)/2005, introducing differential treatment between persons attaining the age of 60 at different periods, was outside the scope of the law transposing the Employment Equality Directive and thus could not be revised as discriminatory. Since then, a number of Court decisions followed suit, where the Courts ruled that pension schemes fixing different retirements ages for different employees, depending on the date of their birth²⁸⁹ or their rank in their service²⁹⁰ were outside the scope of the Directive and thus no discrimination claim could be allowed. A technical problem that arose in many of these Court cases was that, rather than bring a claim for discrimination under the law transposing The Employment Equality Directive, the applicants would either use the procedure provided in Article 146 of the Constitution (seeking to set aside the administrative decision affecting them) or they would ask the Court to annul a legal provision affecting them on the basis of being incompatible with the Constitution or with the law transposing The Employment Equality Directive. In all these cases, the Court ruled that it had no power to amend the allegedly discriminatory law and/or that annulling a law or a regulation that contains discrimination would not benefit the applicant because it would mean cancelling the legal basis from which the desired retirement age derived from.

In the private sector, pension schemes are regulated by collective agreements or private employment contracts, whose conditions are difficult to monitor.

Employees in the private sector may also receive payment upon retirement from the company's Provident Funds. Such payment is regulated by the conditions of the Fund itself and by the law on Provident Funds, which provides that the charters of such funds may not contain provisions which amount to gender discrimination.²⁹¹ Although the provident fund law was amended in 2005,²⁹² no provision was added rendering provisions which discriminate on other grounds unlawful. However, in the event that the charter of a provident fund contains provisions leading to discrimination on any of the five grounds of the Employment Equality Directive, it may be possible to declare them discriminatory and therefore unlawful on the basis of article 4(c) of Law 58(I)/2004 (transposing article 3.1(c) of the Employment Equality Directive on conditions of employment), subject of course to the exception in article 6(2) of the Directive (transposed by article 8(3) of Law 58(I)/2004).

Maruko case

The applicability of the EJC opinion in the Maruko case in the context of Cyprus is debateable, given that Cyprus recognises neither same-sex marriages nor registered partnerships. The rationale of the CJEU that the surviving partners of deceased employees who had lived with the deceased "in a union of mutual support and assistance which is formally constituted for life" should be entitled to the same benefits as surviving spouses, would probably not be extended by the Cypriot courts to cover same sex partners in relationships which are not registered. Since the reasoning is based on equating the benefits accruing to spouses with those afforded to life partners, it is not at all certain that the Courts will extend the principle to relationships which may well be precarious.

The failure of Cypriot law to recognise same sex partnerships, however, creates a legal vacuum in which same sex partners are facing discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation, since they are not afforded the opportunity to register and formalise their relationship and enjoy the benefits accruing from that. In 2010 the equality body issued a report pursuant to two complaints regarding the lack of a legislative framework that may enable gay couples to formalise their relationships. The report recommends that measures be taken by the state to recognise the relationship of homosexuals living under the same roof, which has caused considerable reaction amongst conservative political circles.

In examining another complaint for sexual orientation discrimination in 2008 against the refusal of the immigration authorities to allow the same sex partner of an EU national to join him in Cyprus, the Equality Body found that, although Cyprus chose not to recognise same sex marriages or partners, it is nevertheless bound by the anti-discrimination acquis, the international conventions and the fundamental human rights that demand that any discretion be exercised in line with the anti-discrimination principle.²⁹³

²⁹² Law N.75(I)/2005.

²⁹³ Case Ref. No. A.K.R. 68/2008, dated 23.04.08

In its decision, the equality body cited ECtHR case law which established that the term 'family life' is not restricted to relationships within a marriage but includes also de facto family relations where the parties live together outside marriage (and not necessarily in a registered partnership). The equality body arrived at the same conclusion in another case concerning the complaint of a Cypriot national against the decision of the immigration authorities to deny his Canadian homosexual spouse the right to stay in Cyprus, on the ground that national legislation does not recognise same sex marriages.

It should be noted however that there is a great disparity between Court decisions and equality body decisions, in that the equality body is prepared to move beyond the strictly legalistic approach and take into consideration sources such as the report of the Fundamental Rights Agency on Homophobia, reports of Amnesty International and ILGA and the Proposal for a new Council Directive on discrimination beyond employment, indicating a willingness to take into consideration the concerns and policy priorities of the European Union, whilst Courts would stick to the legalistic and technical approach that would almost certainly result in the rejection of a claim by same sex partners to receive benefits accruing to spouses.

War-related pensions

Another law²⁹⁴ provides for the payment of special war-related pensions to Greek-Cypriots only (the term in this case including Maronites, Armenians and Latins but not Turkish Cypriots), thus introducing discrimination on the ground of ethnic origin against Turkish-Cypriots, who have also been adversely affected by inter-communal violence and by the 1974 war.

In addition, it is generally known that in practice, many undertakings exclude from their pension schemes or their provident funds the migrant workers employed there on a temporary work permit, but there is no mechanism to monitor this phenomenon, whilst the migrants themselves are reluctant to take up such a case for fear of victimisation.

Sector pension schemes

Some professions like doctors and lawyers have their own pension schemes which are based on members' contributions and are managed by a council, which also decides on the terms of the pension scheme. In the case of lawyers, the Law on Advocates provides for a pension scheme created for the benefit of persons registered in the Registry of advocates, which is based on contributions.

²⁹⁴ Law on Relief of Sufferers N. 114/1988

The law, however, excludes from registration in the Registry lawyers from third countries (i.e. outside the EU but including member states of the European Economic Area and Switzerland),²⁹⁵ which consequently deprives them from the right to participate in the pension scheme.

3.2.4 Access to all types and to all levels of vocational guidance, vocational training, advanced vocational training and retraining, including practical work experience (Article 3(1)(b))

Note that there is an overlap between ‘vocational training’ and ‘education’. For example, university courses have been treated as vocational training in the past by the Court of Justice. Other courses, especially those taken after leaving school, may fall into this category. Does the national anti-discrimination law apply to vocational training outside the employment relationship, such as that provided by technical schools or universities, or such as adult life long learning courses?

The laws transposing the Employment Equality Directive²⁹⁶ are in compliance with Article 3(1)(b) of the Directive. The scope of Law 58(I)/2004 which transposes the Employment Equality Directive (minus disability) includes “training” without specifying whether or not this must be part of an employment relationship or not. In the absence of a provision restricting the scope to training within employment, it may safely be assumed that the law does apply to vocational training outside the employment relationship, such as that provided by technical schools or universities or other educational establishments, including life-long learning courses.

In a legal opinion supplied by the Equality Body in 2006 upon the request of a governmental department, it was established that the anti-discrimination laws apply to access to training even if this does not take place within an employment relationship. The case concerned a trainee air traffic controller who suffered vision impairment as a result of which he would probably never be able to work as an air traffic controller. The equality body ruled that he should continue his training nevertheless, because denying him access to training on the ground of his disability would amount to discrimination prohibited by law.²⁹⁷ Other equality body decisions found unlawful discrimination to exist in the fixing of an age limit for applying for state scholarships²⁹⁸ and in the exclusion of persons with disability from admission to the state nursing school.²⁹⁹

²⁹⁸ The case is discussed earlier in this report, in section 3.7.

²⁹⁹ The case is referred to in the Cyprus Country Report of the European Network of Legal Experts in the non-discrimination field (state of affairs up to 08.01.2007).

Also in a 2010 decision the equality body stated more explicitly that, based on an CJEU ruling,³⁰⁰ access to university education which prepares the student for obtaining a qualification or a special skill for a certain profession or occupation amounts to access to vocational training; the case concerned the criteria for admission to an Open University adult life-long learning course.³⁰¹

Given the line of approach adopted by the equality body in these cases, it can safely be assumed that the non-discrimination principle applies to all kinds of training or courses.

3.2.5 Membership of, and involvement in, an organisation of workers or employers, or any organisation whose members carry on a particular profession, including the benefits provided for by such organisations (Article 3(1)(d))

The wording of Article 3(1) (d) is repeated verbatim in the national law.³⁰²

On 4.11.2005 the Equality body issued a decision with regard to a clause in the standard employment contract, for the employment of migrant domestic workers, the specimen for which is issued by the Ministry of Labour, which prohibits their involvement in trade unions. The decision found the said clause discriminatory and asked for its deletion from the contract. The new standard contract issued by the authorities no longer contain that provision, however it still contains a provision prohibiting political participation of migrant employees.

In relation to paragraphs 2.2.6 – 2.2.10 you should focus on how discrimination based on racial or ethnic origin is covered by national law, but you should also mention if the law extends to other grounds.

3.2.6 Social protection, including social security and healthcare (Article 3(1)(e) Directive 2000/43)

In relation to religion or belief, age, disability and sexual orientation, does national law seek to rely on the exception in Article 3(3), Directive 2000/78?

Article 3(a) of Law 58(I)/2004 (transposing to a large extent the Employment Equality Directive), as well as the Law on Persons with Disability (N.127(I)/2000 as amended by N.57(I)/2004) seek to rely on the exception in Article 3(3) of the Employment Equality Directive.

However, there are other legal instruments offering protection against social security and healthcare discrimination beyond the ground of race and ethnic origin.

³⁰² Law N.58 (I)/2004, s.4 (d) and Law N.57 (I)/2004, s.5 (a) (1) (d)

Firstly, the Public Assistance Law N.8/1991 provides for minimum standard for all living persons in Cyprus irrespective of ethnic, racial or national origin. Moreover, Protocol 12 extends the fields of application to all the grounds listed (in the enjoyment of any right granted under national law, against public authorities in the exercise of any power granted by national law, where the public authority has exercised discretionary powers, including both acts or omissions of public authorities). Protocol 12 becomes operative through the expanded powers granted to the Equality body³⁰³ which prohibit discrimination for all grounds under the Protocol and cover “social protection, social security and medical care,” without any of the exceptions allowed for above.

In a 2005 decision, the Equality body found that the refusal of public assistance to an asylum-seeker because of his nationality amounted to indirect discrimination on the ground of race or ethnic origin in the area of social protection and social welfare.³⁰⁴ The refusal of the health authorities to subsidise an under-fertile Pontian Greek citizen to do in-vitro fertilisation (IVF) was also held to be discriminatory.³⁰⁵ As far as health is concerned, the equality body has ruled that the refusal to issue a health card (which entitles free treatment at hospital) to asylum-seekers due to the fact that they did not have their ‘pink slip’ (residence permit) was discriminatory on the basis of ethnic origin;³⁰⁶ as a result, and in compliance with the said decision, the Ministry of Health issued a circular to hospitals to issue health cards to asylum seekers even in the absence of pink slips, where there is an emergency.³⁰⁷ Two Equality Body decisions in 2010 established that the fixing of the age limit of 65 for funding radical prostatectomy and the fixing of the age limit of 40 as a condition of eligibility for financial support for artificial insemination were both discriminatory.³⁰⁸

3.2.7 Social advantages (Article 3(1)(f) Directive 2000/43)

This covers a broad category of benefits that may be provided by either public or private actors to people because of their employment or residence status, for example reduced rate train travel for large families, child birth grants, funeral grants and discounts on access to municipal leisure facilities. It may be difficult to give an exhaustive analysis of whether this category is fully covered in national law, but you should indicate whether national law explicitly addresses the category of ‘social advantages’ or if discrimination in this area is likely to be unlawful.

The second complaint came from an Indian asylum seeker whose wife was also in the last month of her pregnancy (File No A/P 1363/05). The third case involved a Kurdish couple from Syria with two underage children who applied for asylum. The wife was also in her last stage of pregnancy but was refused access to medical care because she did not have a health card (File No A/P 1487/05).

³⁰⁸ Equality Body Decision dated 24/11/2010, Ref. AKR 164/2008, AKR 63/2010 and Ref. A.K.R. 126/2009, dated 27.04.2010 respectively. Both cases are reported above.

There is an issue regarding the very term 'social advantage'. The term is translated by the official translation unit of the European Commission in Luxembourg as 'social provisions' and finds its way in the national legislation in this form.

However, the term is not referred to in Law 42(I)/2004, which sets out the equality body's mandate, but in the Equal Treatment (Racial or Ethnic Origin) Law 59(I)/2004, s.4(c) and the Law concerning Persons with Disabilities (Law 127(I)/ 2000), s.6. The equality body's mandate covers all areas within the scope of Article 3 of the Racial Equality Directive save for 'social advantage'. In any case, to the extent that 'social advantage' is state provided, the Ombudsman (which is also the national equality body) is empowered to deal with it, as part of its mandate to investigate allegations for maladministration in the public sector. However the Ombudsman's powers are narrower than those of the Equality Body as its decisions are not binding and it has no power to impose fines. It should be stated, however, that in the case of the Equality Body the fines foreseen by law are so low that the Equality Body invariably chooses to use its mediation function rather than impose fines which would act as no deterrent.

National legislation explicitly refers to the category of 'social advantages' but does not provide any definition or list, which makes it even more difficult to monitor. Some groups do have such benefits (pensioners, other vulnerable groups), but given the relative underdevelopment of public utilities and poor public transport system, this is not a major issue in Cyprus.

There are cases where persons become entitled to a type of benefit as a result of his/her employment status. One example is the case of sheltered workshops described in Article 2.7 of this Report, where persons with disabilities working in these workshops receive higher payment if they are married than if they are single.

A number of benefits are available to certain³⁰⁹ persons with disabilities, such as the exemption from fees for medical services in public medical institutions. Persons who are unemployed or of low income are also entitled to free medical and pharmaceutical care in state hospitals. By a decision of the Council of Ministers³¹⁰ a scheme of public assistance was created for the housing of single persons or families having a low income with special criteria for persons with disability. Also, persons with disability are exempted from certain charges concerning telecommunications and telephone services.³¹¹

Following a comprehensive tax reform, there are no longer tax discounts applying to persons on the basis of their marital status or otherwise.

³¹¹ Regulations 311/2001, 382/2002, 473/2002, 525/2002 and a number of decisions of the Cyprus Telecommunications Authority.

There are only state benefits granted to parents for their children, whether conceived inside or outside marriage and whether adopted or not. The child benefits are available to all parents irrespective of whether they are married or not.

Other than the above benefits, which may be regarded as positive measures, discrimination on the ground of race and ethnic origin in the provision of social advantage is prohibited, as per s.4(c) of Law 59(I)/2004.

In the case of the Roma population of Cyprus, since most, if not all of them³¹², are deemed to be part of the Turkish community of Cyprus and thus Cypriot citizens, they are entitled to all benefits that Cypriot citizens have and any differential treatment afforded to them would amount to discrimination on the ground of race/ethnic origin, as is the case with discrimination against Turkish-Cypriots. Having said that, it should be noted that many members of the Roma community and particularly the older ones are uneducated, do not speak the language and live in destitution, so their ability to access public benefits may be limited. Although there has been no case to test this, it is certain that Roma people residing in the Turkish controlled north of Cyprus will not be entitled to any state benefit from the government of the Republic of Cyprus, given that Turkish Cypriots residing in the north are, as a matter of state policy, not granted any state benefits. Despite the Supreme Court decision in *Tetyana Tomko v. Republic of Cyprus*³¹³ which established that differential treatment based on the place of residence (i.e. north or south of Cyprus) is unlawful, the approach followed both by the Courts³¹⁴ and the equality body is that persons residing in the north of Cyprus are not entitled to state benefits, even if they work in the south and pay their social insurance contributions to the state.³¹⁵

3.2.8 Education (Article 3(1)(g) Directive 2000/43)

This covers all aspects of education, including all types of schools. Please also consider cases and/ or patterns of segregation and discrimination in schools, affecting notably the Roma community and people with disabilities. If these cases and/ or patterns exist, please refer also to relevant legal/political discussions that may exist in your country on the issue.

³¹² Generally speaking, the Roma of Cyprus are seen as indistinguishable from the Turkish Cypriots because of their religion (Muslim) and their language (Turkish), although one cannot exclude the possibility that today amongst the Roma population of Cyprus there may be persons who came from other countries, in which case they are not entitled to Cypriot citizenship.

³¹⁵ Decision dated 19.04.2006, File No. A.K.R. 27/2005, where the equality body found that the Finance Ministry's rejection of the complainant's application for a child benefit was justified and that no discrimination existed, because it was not possible for the authorities to carry out the checks necessary to verify whether the information supplied by the applicant is true or not, adding that those Turkish-Cypriots residing in the areas under the control of the government are not subjected to discriminatory treatment in the field of state benefits.

Please briefly describe the general approach to education for children with disabilities in your country, and the extent to which mainstream education and segregated "special" education are favoured and supported.

School segregation

Measures for the integration of Romani children are taken in the field of education, albeit targeting all "Turkish-speaking" pupils and not the Roma specifically; there is nothing in the school curriculum on Roma culture or history. These measures consist mainly of Turkish language support teaching, pursuant to the government's constitutional obligation to provide education for the Turkish Cypriot community in their mother tongue. A few other measures are also in place, such as free school uniforms, lunch offered at school, transport to school etc, in order to encourage school attendance.

In spite of these, a study conducted by the Limassol Regional Welfare Office in 2004 concerning the social exclusion of Turkish Cypriots residing in Limassol (of whom 75% are Roma) found that there is clearly a pattern of low educational attainment of this specific group and a lack of interest by the parents over the educational opportunities of their children.³¹⁶ The study notes that the severe economic problems faced by these families, the squalid living conditions, low parental educational level and the widespread anti-Turkish and anti-Roma prejudice generate a negative attitude of these groups towards the educational system. The eventual outcome is the quick school exit seeking to enter the labour market, either as beggars or working in difficult manual occupations. Another study in 2005 showed that linguistic barriers often drive Roma pupils out of school, as they do not understand a word of what is being said in the classroom, where apart from the support Turkish classes, teaching is in Greek.³¹⁷ However in recent years, in one particular school with the highest concentration of Romani pupils, a number of additional measures aiming for more inclusive and multi-cultural education are now beginning to bear fruit, as it will be explained below.

In spite of the fact that Cyprus has ratified the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (ICERD) since 1966,³¹⁸ which obliges states to "prevent, prohibit and eradicate all practices of racial segregation", as expressed in General Comment 19 of ICERD, there is still segregation of the Roma in the Republic controlled south. In part this appears to be an unintended consequence of policy, and in part reflecting discriminatory attitudes, the 'cultural capital' and socio-economic and family conditions of the Roma in Cyprus.

³¹⁸ The International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (ICERD) of March 7 1966, was ratified and incorporated as Law 12/67, as amended by Laws 11/92, 6(III)/95 and 28(III)/99.

The Roma children continue to be treated as pupils with special language requirements, in spite of the fact that Cyprus has ratified a number of international conventions on human rights³¹⁹ as well as on specific rights in the field of education.³²⁰ A complaint was, for the first time, submitted recently to the Equality Body on discrimination against the Roma in the field of education in 2008, the investigation of which is still pending.³²¹ The complaint which was submitted on 31.1.2008 alleged insufficient support and integration measures for Roma pupils in education, failure on the part of the government to recognise the Roma as a special ethnic group and as a group speaking a minority language (Kurbetcha), failure to promote Romani language and culture in violation of international conventions ratified by the Republic³²² and in disregard of the recommendations by ECRI,³²³ the Council of Europe³²⁴ and the OSCE.³²⁵

Over the past years Cyprus has ratified treaties in the field of education and thus adopted certain measures as a result³²⁶ including the European Social Charter (Revised)³²⁷ and other international instruments³²⁸. However, apart from the general provisions for the right to education and general 'humanistic' education, there is generally little connection in policy-making with the fact that Roma are Cypriot citizens with rights under anti-discrimination/ human rights laws. At local level, some elements of multicultural education and teacher training for primary and secondary education have been introduced to cope with an increasingly multi-ethnic and multicultural setting, but this is still at an early stage.

³¹⁹ Convention of the United Nations against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment (ratified by Law 235/90 and Law 35(111)/93). ³²⁸ E.g. Resolution ResCMN(2002)3 on the implementation of the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities by Cyprus.

In spite of the fact that official policy is not to segregate and on occasion the Ministry of Education has been particularly drastic in taking measures to avoid segregation and the creation of ghetto-based schools, there is a high concentration of Turkish-speaking pupils (mainly Roma and Turkish Cypriots) in particular schools, attributed mainly to the concentration or even ghettoisation of migrants, Turkish-Cypriots and Roma in certain (impoverished) residential areas. More than half of the Roma pupils attending public schools today are concentrated in one school, the 18th Primary School in Limassol (the second largest city in Cyprus), which has more than 50 Roma pupils out of a total of 166 pupils.

According to one study, the headmaster of a school and social worker reported that Greek-Cypriot parents move their children to other schools when they see that in one particular school there is a high number of migrant or non-Greek-Cypriot pupils.³²⁹ The same researchers state: “Based on the responses we received from the teachers, we discovered that the student population was not evenly divided. Non-indigenous pupils were concentrated in certain classrooms (i.e. 21 out of 30 pupils or 14 out of 30). This sheds doubt on the effectiveness of the Ministry of Education’s efforts to distribute ethnic minority pupils evenly.” Moreover, they claim that “non-indigenous pupils of a younger age appear to obtain better academic results than older pupils, who appear to find it more difficult to adjust to a new life and adjust to the nature of the educational curriculum. However, the majority of school teachers (80per cent) believe that, although the language is a major factor in underperformance, it is not the only contributing factor.” Many Greek-Cypriot parents try to transfer their children away from schools attended by Romani children and if they cannot succeed, they instruct them to avoid contact with Roma children; many Greek-Cypriot children do in fact demonstrate racial prejudice towards the Roma children.³³⁰ It is apparent that ‘family and socio-economic problems’ penetrate school life with a vengeance. Studies show there is segregation between schools, in part reflecting the wealth or poverty of the surrounding neighbourhood with certain schools becoming the schools of the poor, migrants, the Turkish-Cypriots and the Roma.

³²⁹ Their research is based on an empirical study of one primary school in Limassol with a high concentration of non-indigenous pupils. To quote the research: “the head teacher reported that the observed school used to be: a high profile school and everyone in the area considered it to have high standards where children could acquire the necessary academic skills. More recently, due to the increasing number of registrations from non-indigenous pupils, many Greek Cypriot parents have stopped sending their children to this school.” See C. Panayiotopoulos and M. Nicolaidou (2007) “At a crossroads of civilizations: multicultural educational provision in Cyprus through the lens of a case study”, European Journal of Intercultural studies, Volume 18 , Issue 1, March 2007, pages p. 69.

The primary school with the highest concentration of Roma in the south, the 18th primary school, apparently has a large number of children from many families under the supervision of the Social Welfare Office (e.g. families with divorced or imprisoned parents), with problems that had been in existence before the arrival of large numbers of Turkish-speaking children.³³¹ In research conducted at a school in Limassol, the principal stated that there were problems because Greek-Cypriot parents reacted very negatively to the fact that Turkish-Cypriot and Roma students were studying there, claiming that 'gypsy children have something violent attached to their character'. As many as 25 Greek-Cypriot pupils were moved from the school by their parents because of the presence of Turkish-Cypriot and Roma children.³³²

During the same interview, the head teacher rejected claims of any discrimination taking place, but was critical of systemic failure; moreover, the principal seemed worried that there were children not able to integrate into the school system: 'A lot of gypsies learned to read and write but up to a point. What puzzles us is that they don't integrate. They don't feel that this school has rules, which they have to obey.'

In the case of the Roma, school segregation is inevitably linked to the housing policies implemented in respect of this community. The specially designated Roma settlements of pre-fabricated houses are all located in segregated settings, with the exception of a number of Roma families living in the old Turkish quarter of Limassol where, although impoverished, are residing in the same neighbourhood as Greek Cypriots, Turkish Cypriots and migrants. This is not to say that Roma families residing in the old Turkish quarter of Limassol are necessarily well-integrated into the local communities, as relations are often strained and the Roma are sometimes shunned by the other inhabitants.

In a statement to the press dated 10.02.2008, the elementary school teachers' union presented the following statistical data in terms of school attendance by foreign pupils: A total of over 8,000 foreign students attend kindergartens, primary and secondary education schools which is analysed as follows: kindergartens 995, elementary schools 4,422, secondary schools 2,626. At one particular Nicosia school (Phaneromeni elementary school) 71 out of a total of 87 pupils (81.6%) are non-Greek native speakers. In the school of Ayios Antonios in Limassol 55 out of 146 pupils (37.6%) are non-Greek native speakers. In another school in Limassol (Potamos Yermasoyias), 97 out of 245 (39.6%) are non-Greek native speakers. In the 6th Elementary School of Paphos 203 out of 241 (84.2%) are non-Greek native speakers. At the 4th School of Paphos 136 out of 230 (59%) are non-Greek native speakers.

At the Makarios Lyceum of Paphos, there are 189 foreign pupils, out of whom 137 are from Georgia. At the gymnasiums of Ayios Theodoros and Nikolaidio of Paphos, there are over 100 non-Greek native speakers.

At the Linopetra gymnasium in Limassol there are 103 foreign pupils originating from 20 different countries. The figures were given in an effort to support the teachers' demand for the introduction of the scheme of special reception classes at schools for foreign pupils, in the absence of which, according to the teachers' union, foreign pupils are led to ghettoisation and exclusion.³³³

In itself such a situation is not necessarily negative, if this 'concentration' (a) was the result of the free movement of populations utilising their local affinities, family networks, ties and support, (b) the local area which they reside is not deprived but vibrant, multicultural and open to persons of different ethnic mix for cultural exchange; and (c) the multi-cultural mix of the school itself would act as a solid basis for developing expertise and innovative teaching geared towards a multicultural environment and not as the basis for a marginalised, deprived and second rate school.

In short, if the policy aims at the avoidance of deprived, ghetto-like schools in deprived areas and neighbourhoods, then the policy is in compliance with anti-discrimination and international law and human rights standards.

By contrast, if the policy is one of blanket 'dispersal' with motives such as the dispersal of ethnic minorities as a concession to local xenophobic sentiments and attitudes that minority populations should 'not affect native culture and tradition', or to ensure that minorities and migrants are 'not visible in public', then it is clearly racially-motivated and is in breach of anti-discrimination laws and standards.

In practice, the current policy has resulted in the ghettoisation of the residential area and of the school located in it, with the typical manifestations of exclusion and poverty, and has reinforced and cemented the prejudice demonstrated by the inhabitants of the neighbouring areas, who had from the beginning objected to the settlement of these communities in the vicinity.

The available statistical data points to the direction of certain discrepancies in the implementation of educational policies. Whilst the official policy is in favour of desegregating the schools by allocating the minority children in several schools to prevent 'ghettoisation', there is a failure in dispersing minorities, and in particular Roma across the country. Not only the numbers of minority children have slightly risen at specific schools, there is an inverse relationship between the increased concentrations of students with a specific ethnic minority background correlated to a decreased enrolment of Greek Cypriot pupils in the specific schools. The Third ECRI Report on Cyprus notes that "...the Cypriot authorities have used language and displayed attitudes vis-à-vis these persons that were not conducive to defusing tensions and promoting acceptance of Roma by the local communities."³³⁴

In fact the only single Roma-related complaint dealt with by the Ombudsman emanated from residents of an area close to a Roma settlement against the authorities for allegedly ignoring the residents' request to relocate the Roma settlement, complaining about the Roma lifestyle with overtly racist language. In response, the Ombudsman found the complainant's allegations of higher crime rates unfounded and went a step further to stress the rights of the Roma community and criticise the authorities for lacking the political will to solve their problems and for yielding to the unreasonable reactions of the local communities.³³⁵

Educational Priorities Zones

For the first time during school year 2003-2004 the Ministry of Education introduced the institution of the Educational Priorities Zones (ZEP) which aims at promoting literacy and school achievement in economically and socially depressed areas.

One of the criteria as to whether a certain area is deemed as an Educational Priority Zone is the number of non Greek-speaking residents.

This measure aims at placing in a special category certain schools where special attention and particular measures are needed to address certain educational needs, such as pupils coming from particularly poverty-stricken areas, high concentration of non-native Greek speakers, high dropout rate etc. Schools classified as falling within EPZ receive extra teaching hours and other measures where needed. The institution of EPZ aims at reducing inequalities for pupils attending schools in disadvantaged areas with an increased proportion of immigrants and ethnic communities, combating school failure and illiteracy.

There are currently three EPZ are in operation in Cyprus, covering 17 school units and including the schools with a high concentration of Roma pupils.³³⁶

The data compiled by the Ministry of Education for the purposes of the National Report on Strategies for Social Protection and Social Inclusion 2006-2008³³⁷ illustrates that the pilot operation of the Educational Priority Zones had positive results for local communities, including the Roma community residing there:

- In the school units covered by EPZs there has been a reduction of pupil drop-outs, of school failure (referrals and failures) and of referrals to the Educational Psychology Service, as well as improvement of school success.
- Support of the foreign language speaking pupils has led to increasing their entry into the educational system of Cyprus, to reducing the number of drop-outs and to improving their performance.

- Increase of school presence and of the proportion of enrolment and attendance of Roma pupils.

In recent years the primary education school 18th Primary School of Ayios Antonios in Limassol that hosts the largest number of Roma, has adopted a number of measures for Roma inclusion and multicultural education. Extra classes of Greek language are offered to pupils whose mother tongue is not Greek (children of migrants, Turkish Cypriots, Roma etc). For the school year 2005-2006, a total of 1,356 hours of extra Greek language classes were offered in schools across Cyprus. For the school year 2007-2008 a total of 1,395 hours of extra Greek language classes was offered. This measure involved the hiring of additional 48 teachers. The books for teaching Greek to non-native Greek speakers which are being used have been designed in and brought from Greece, where they were being used under similar situations.

Although this measure has not been evaluated to assess its impact, one of the schools where this measure is in place, namely the aforesaid 18th Primary School of Ayios Antonios in Limassol, attended by a large number of Turkish speaking pupils, was awarded the Commonwealth Education Good Practice Award in 2006.³³⁸

A study conducted in 2009³³⁹ demonstrated that a number of positive measures had been taken by the school and the current head teacher in particular have created the necessary trust from Roma and other parents for the school to progress (interview with head teacher). Many teachers expressed satisfaction that there has been a significant improvement in the attendance, understanding and better cooperation between Roma and non-Roma children (interview with head teacher; focus group/seminar with primary school teachers in Limassol, 4 March 2009). However, many teachers expressed concern over the inadequacy of the curriculum for Roma children: most simply fall through the system, leaving the school before having learned much, or having developed their own skills and potential, since the whole school system, its curriculum and ethos does not correspond to their experiences and lifestyles. Some appear to do very well, but these are in a tiny minority; most do not learn much. Teachers argued that the generally low educational attainment of Roma pupils marginalises them further and reduces their own self-confidence, whilst it reinforces the prejudices and stereotypes of Greek-Cypriot, Turkish-Cypriots and migrant pupils about the Roma as 'stupid', 'lazy' and 'losers' (focus group/seminar with primary school teachers in Limassol, 4 March 2009). It was pointed out that despite the great progress made, the problem is that the current centralised core framework does not allow a major departure from a centralised system of setting the curriculum; moreover, the fact that the state until recently did not recognise the Roma as a distinct minority group or culture creates problems which are particularly relevant to integration.

This is likely to continue for future generations unless policies are changed to allow for an educational program more relevant to Roma experiences, culture and lifestyles. Although the Cypriot government in its report of 2009 to the Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention on National Minorities recognised the Roma as a minority within the meaning of the Convention, this has not as yet been translated into policy in any field and no measures have been taken in response to this policy change.

Equality body decisions regarding racist behaviour at schools

In 2008 two complaints were submitted to the equality body on education discrimination: one complaint concerns discrimination against Roma pupils based on information emanating from a research study; the other complaint is against school authorities and the Education Ministry for failing to take measures to combat repeated racist incidents at schools. At the time of writing, the complaint regarding Roma education was still in the process of investigation, but a decision was issued regarding the second complaint,³⁴⁰ which was submitted against the Ministry of Education for its refusal to address racism at schools. In its report the Equality body found that the incidents complained of contain the element of racism which must be immediately addressed by the teaching community and the Education Ministry and that any efforts to cover up or downgrade the significance of such events or failure to record them as such amounts to a short-sighted handling of the phenomenon which disempowers victims. The report recorded further incidents of manifestly racist behaviour at schools, criticising the school's approach of refusing to acknowledge the racist nature of the incidents recommending the adoption of decisive measures including dissuasive sanctions against perpetrators, the setting up of a specialised mechanism to examine complaints and record incidents, as well as intercultural educational policy, with a program of interactive anti-racist education and training.

The aforesaid equality body report was given considerable media coverage and came in the midst of heated political debates regarding nationalism and racism within the education system and the implementation of a comprehensive educational reform. A number of other racist attacks at schools were highlighted by the media in 2009, prompting a discussion in the House of Parliament amongst policy makers, stakeholders and NGOs. An Equality body reports that followed, the refusal of the school authorities as well as the police to acknowledge, address and take measures against of racism were once more criticised. At a press conference on 30.10.2008, the Ministry of Education announced that it endorses the recommendations of the Equality body in this case. In spite of the Minister's pledge to address racism at schools, no particular measures were taken until late in 2010, when the Ministry of Education set up an observatory for school violence, using the methodology developed by and in close cooperation with the International Observatory of Violence in Schools and the European Observatory on School Violence.³⁴¹

³⁴¹ <http://www.ijvs.org/1-6035-International-Observatory-on-Violence-in-School.php> (27.08.2010)

The observatory which is scheduled to commence recording violence at schools in 2011 is mandated to cover all types of violence, including (but not limited to) racist, religiously motivated and homophobic violence.

During 2009 the equality body issued another decision following an incident of racial violence at school, where 40 or so pupils attacked a black pupil after a volleyball match where it criticised the refusal of the school authorities as well as the police to address and take measures against racism.³⁴² However, the report falls short from recommending concrete measures to be taken in order to address this and other incidents of racist violence, despite its emphasis on the growing tendencies of the phenomenon. In that vain, the report accepts the setting up of the monitoring mechanism promised by the Minister of Education as exhaustive of the measures that may be taken. In addition, although the report hints on the fact that teachers essentially disregard state policies over the handling of racist incidents and apply their own decisions, it does not recommend any measures to be taken against the teachers. This is a wider problem facing Cypriot society in recent months, where the leadership of the teachers' unions are openly opposing the government's efforts for comprehensive educational reform towards multicultural education and go as far as issuing decisions contradicting the circulars issued by the Ministry of Education. No measures were taken against the teachers' union, presumably in an effort to appease rather than intensify a rather confrontational climate which has developed between the teachers and the government over the educational reform measures.

The U.S. State Report on human rights practices in Cyprus for the year 2009, as well as the same report for previous years, expressed particularly serious concern with the history textbooks used at school, stating that textbooks used at the primary and secondary school levels included language biased against Turkish Cypriots and Turks or they refrained from mentioning the Turkish-Cypriot community altogether.

The report refers to anecdotal evidence indicating that teachers used handouts and held discussions that included inflammatory language in the classroom.³⁴³ A study published in 2008 on the content of the history schoolbooks established that stereotypes based on ethnic nationalism permeate the whole of the Greek Cypriot curricula, confirming the findings of the 2004 report of the Committee for Educational Reform that the educational system is 'hellenoethnocentric and religious in character', 'Greek-centred, narrowly ethnocentric and culturally monolithic.'³⁴⁴

A different climate prevailed in 2010 however when a number of racist attacks at school received little or no attention from either the Equality Body, policy makers or politicians.

³⁴⁴ Papadakis, y. (2008) History Education in Divided Cyprus: A comparison of Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot Schoolbooks on the 'History of Cyprus'.

The author attributes this to the rise of far right politics and the fear of policy makers and politicians of having to pay a high political cost if they find themselves at the centre of public debates and confrontations on the heated issue of immigration. In the case of the Equality Body, the fact that the term of person in charge expired in December 2010 and the institution remained headless for several weeks meant that it could not properly respond to these manifestations of racism of the past few months.

Disability in education

National legislation prohibits discrimination in education on the ground of, inter alia, disability³⁴⁵ but only as far as the mandate of the equality body is concerned. In other words, a victim may complain to the equality body for discrimination in education on the ground of disability. A decision of the Equality Body may however be taken to Court in order to obtain a judgement. The law on persons with disability which transposes the disability component of The Employment Equality Directive does not grant the right to apply directly to the district Court in order to contest discrimination in access to education.

In relation to disability, in particular, protection from discrimination in access to education may arguably also fall under the general prohibition against discrimination in the provision of services, found in Article 6 of the Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127(I)2000. It is evident from a number of equality body decisions that the equality body considers its mandate to include discrimination on the ground of disability in the field of education.

As from September 2001 the Ministry of Education applies the Training and Education of Children with Special Needs Law of 1999 (N.113(I)/1999) and Regulations of 2001. In the framework of the said law as amended, as well as the Regulations on the Mechanism for the timely diagnosis of children with special needs of 2001 assistance is provided to children with special needs in all fields, particularly the psychological, social, educational, prevocational and vocational training at schools, where this is possible. The state is under an obligation to provide special training and education to persons with special needs from the age of three until completion of their studies. Such special training and education is provided in the following forms:

- In a public school, at an ordinary class, in circumstances of full inclusion with support. In such a case, the school program and curriculum is adjusted accordingly and a liaison officer is responsible for the child.

³⁴⁵ The Combating of Racial and other forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law 42(I)/2004, article 6 (f). This provision states that every treatment or behaviour, regulation, condition or practice in the public or the private sector which is prohibited by any law constitutes unlawful discrimination for the purposes of this law on the ground of racial/ethnic origin, religion, belief, community, language, colour, special needs, age and sexual orientation in the field of, inter alia, education.

- In a public school, at a special unit, in circumstances of partial inclusion. The special units are comfortable and accessible spaces in normal schools. The number of children in each unit is determined taking into consideration the special needs, particularities and smooth operation of the unit.
- In a special school. This is a special private or public school staffed by specialised personnel (psychologists, speech therapists, doctors, physiotherapists etc) equipped with modern means to accomplish their mission. The educational policy of these schools includes a system of constant contact of these schools with the normal schools of the same area and the holding of common activities. The special schools are housed in the same premises as normal schools unless the Council of Ministers decides otherwise.
- By providing services in other premises. This is an arrangement done in cooperation with the parents and is applicable for children who for health reasons cannot attend any other school.³⁴⁶

Children with disabilities, physical and mental, are as a matter of general policy placed in mainstream schools, unless their condition is such that requires that they be placed in a special school. The decision as to whether a pupil with a disability will be placed in one of the special schools is made by a district public committee,³⁴⁷ comprising of civil servants from a variety of disciplines and departments.

The procedure followed by the aforesaid committee is, first, the appointment of a first instance multi-discipline group of experts from the public or the private sector who will evaluate the pupil's need for special education or special support within mainstream education. For the purposes of this evaluation, the group is furnished with medical reports from the Ministry of Health, the history of the pupil and any information which the parents may wish to supply.

Each member of the group will then deliver a report on the pupil setting out the tools and methodology used for the evaluation as well as their findings as to the nature and extend of needed support, in case they consider that such is necessary.³⁴⁸ The experts' reports are considered by the district committee who will, following consultation with the parents, make the decision as to whether special schooling is necessary for the pupil in question or not.

The author was unofficially informed by the national organisation for the blind that the committee will usually take the following considerations into account when making their decision: the wish of the parents, the assessment of the teachers at the school which the pupil in question is attending, the existence of any learning difficulties or multiple disabilities, or in the case of visual disability the desire of the pupil to learn Braille, which is not offered at mainstream schools.

³⁴⁶ <http://www.moec.gov.cy/eidiki/>

³⁴⁸ Section 9 of Regulations N. 186/2001.

None of these considerations constitute an absolute criterion and each case is looked upon separately. In many cases, children with a disability are placed in mainstream schools but are offered support by a special education teacher who will regularly visit the school for this purpose.

In the case of children with visual disabilities, for instance, for the school year 2006-2007 there were 11 pupils attending the special School for the Blind, either because they wanted to learn Braille or because they had multiple disabilities or learning difficulties, and 109 pupils attending mainstream schools (including 8 pupils under the age of 3) who received support from teachers from the School for the Blind visiting the school which these pupils attended. As a matter of state policy, children with disabilities cannot be denied access to education on the ground that they are unable to learn.

In September 2007 an association representing the parents of children with Down's syndrome complained that the government did not respond to their repeated calls for the creation of a specialized centre for the treatment of their children, particularly those in need of temporary hospitalization. Some were housed at Athalassa psychiatric hospital, where they allegedly received inadequate care. The parents claimed that the children were naked, locked in their wards for too many hours each day, and were under the influence of sedative medication; the hospital rejected their allegations. In September 2006, the Cyprus Mental Health Commission President had criticized Athalassa psychiatric hospital, calling it "unacceptable."³⁴⁹ In February 2008 the president of the Cyprus Mental Health Commission, Christodoulos Messis, stated that, in order to reduce numbers, patients in the Athalassa psychiatric unit were being released into nursing homes for the elderly regardless of their age, with no plan for their rehabilitation within the community. He criticized the mental health services for not creating appropriate halfway houses and boarding schools to host psychiatric patients wishing to reintegrate into society and return to active employment.³⁵⁰

A similar controversy received media attention in late 2010 early 2011, when an opposition MP asked for the intervention of the equality body in order to terminate the violation of the rights of 17 intellectually disabled adults residing at the psychiatric hospital. The MP who visited them stated that an inter-scientific evaluation of these persons had established that 12 out of 17 of these persons should not be in the psychiatric hospital but instead in houses within the community because they do not have any psychiatric problems.

³⁴⁹ U.S. State Department (Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor) Report, Cyprus: Country Report on Human Rights Practices 2007, released on 11.03.2008 (<http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2007/100554.htm>)

She added that these persons suffer from intellectual disability and not from a psychiatric condition and that they are kept in the psychiatric hospital in conditions reminiscent of previous decades without any scheme for their occupation or plans for their reintegration into the community. Whilst there are a few institutions accommodating minors with intellectual disabilities, the absence of any facilities for adults suffering from intellectual disability has been a matter of concern for the parents whose association has been calling for the setting up of a suitable institution for several years. The Equality Body was at the time headless, pending the appointment of the new Ombudsman, and did not respond to this challenge.

3.2.9 Access to and supply of goods and services which are available to the public (Article 3(1)(h) Directive 2000/43)

- a) Does the law distinguish between goods and services available to the public (e.g. in shops, restaurants, banks) and those only available privately (e.g. limited to members of a private association)? If so, explain the content of this distinction.

Discrimination on the ground of race and ethnic origin for access to and supply of goods and services available to the public is prohibited by article 4(e) of Law 59(I)/2004, transposing the Racial Equality Directive. In addition, the law amending the Ratification law of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination of 1967, No. 11 of 1992, provides that any person who supplies goods and services by way of profession and refuses such goods or services to any person solely due to his/her racial or ethnic origin or religion is guilty of a criminal offence.³⁵¹ The said prohibitions apply, inter alia, to the Roma population of Cyprus, most of whom have Cypriot nationality, although refusal to supply goods and services would, in any case, apply to all, whether they are Cypriot citizens or not. Neither of the two said provisions distinguishes between goods and services available to the public and those only available privately and it can safely be assumed that they apply to both.

For the ground of disability, the relevant law provides for equality of treatment of persons with disabilities with the rest of the citizens of the Republic in the provision of goods, facilities or services; differential treatment amounts to discrimination when the reason for such treatment is related to the person's disability and it is not "justified".³⁵² Also, this provision falls under the ambit of article 9(1) which provides that the principle at stake will be implemented through the taking of "reasonable measures". For more details, please see above, section 2.6(e) of this report.

Also under Article 7 (1) of the disability law N.127(I)/2000 public means of transport must be suitably modified for the entry and safe transportation of persons with disabilities, including persons using wheelchairs. However, the law provides that the application of this provision shall be regulated with regulations issued by the Council of Ministers upon the recommendation of the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance and of the Ministry of Transport and Works.

³⁵¹ Section 2A(4) of Law No. 11 of 1992.

³⁵² Law 127(I)/2000, Article 6(1).

No such regulations have as yet been issued and public transport remains to a large extent inaccessible, although there are plans to adapt buses to some of the needs of persons with disabilities.

Furthermore, Article 8(1) of Law 127(I)/2000 requires that the competent governmental departments must, within a short period of time, proceed to the installation of a suitable system of telephone services which assists persons with a hearing disadvantage or with any other disability of the senses or other speech disability to communicate through the telephone system in a manner proportionate to those persons without such disadvantages. Under the same provision, there must be public means of telecommunication accessible to persons with disabilities, including persons using wheelchairs; and television stations must make arrangements so that at certain hours sign language is available for news broadcasts.

b) Does the law allow for differences in treatment on the grounds of age and disability in the provision of financial services? If so, does the law impose any limitations on how age or disability should be used in this context, e.g. does the assessment of risk have to be based on relevant and accurate actuarial or statistical data?

No provision is made in the law for provision of financial services in particular; the general provisions regarding supply of services would apply in this case as well.

3.2.10 Housing (Article 3(1)(h) Directive 2000/43)

To which aspects of housing does the law apply? Are there any exceptions? Please also consider cases and patterns of housing segregation and discrimination against the Roma and other minorities or groups, and the extent to which the law requires or promotes the availability of housing which is accessible to people with disabilities and older people.

Discrimination on the ground of race and ethnic origin in housing is prohibited by article 4(1)(e) of Law 59(I)/2004 (transposing the Racial Equality Directive). This provision describes the scope of application of the law and expressly refers to “the access to goods and services available to the public and the supply thereof, including housing” as one of the fields of application. Section 4(2) of the same law sets out the exception as provided for in the Directive, i.e. that the law does not apply to differential treatment due to nationality and does not extend to conditions of entry and stay of third country nationals and stateless persons, nor to the treatment arising under the legal status of such persons. It should be noted that access to one’s own property was not deemed by the Courts to fall within the meaning of the term ‘housing’.

A 2007 Supreme Court decision on an application for referral to the CJEU of the question whether article 2 of the Racial Equality Directive could be interpreted in a manner permitting an EU member state to deny the lawful owner of a property the right to sell it was rejected in a decision where the judge stated that the issue at stake (access to property) was deemed to be outside the scope of the Directive.³⁵³

Some restrictions apply in the field of acquisition of immovable property by non-Cypriots, under the Acquisition of Immovable Property (Aliens) Law, which require non-Cypriots to apply for permit before they can register immovable property in their name. Also, a housing scheme developed by the Interior Ministry intended to benefit both Cypriots and other EU citizens, requires non-Cypriot EU citizens to submit evidence of their uninterrupted stay in Cyprus for five years as a precondition for their eligibility.³⁵⁴

Patterns of segregation: migrants

A Parliamentary debate on 08.07.2010 examined a number of immigration related problems, after a comprehensive report prepared by the Parliamentary Human Rights Committee recorded the prejudice, racism and xenophobia against the rising number of migrants in Cyprus.³⁵⁵ In April 2010 the Nicosia Municipality started to secure eviction orders for old and unmaintained commercial premises basically unfit for human habitation being used as homes for poor immigrants.³⁵⁶ Although the measure is in theory intended to improve living conditions of migrant workers, it will inevitably lead some migrants to homelessness and others to share more cramped space in residential apartments with other migrants. No plan has been made by the Municipality regarding the relocation of the persons evicted.³⁵⁷ Newspaper reports regularly highlight the plight of immigrants' homelessness and squalid living conditions³⁵⁸ whilst police raids sometimes lead to the discovery of squalid shacks inhabited by migrant workers who are victims of labour trafficking and who are forced to work long hours and have their travel documents and pay withheld.³⁵⁹

A qualitative survey conducted in May 2010 by Insights Market Research in cooperation with the European University of Nicosia on behalf of the Socialist Women's Movement,³⁶⁰ which investigated the views and experiences of women from Britain, Bulgaria, Romania, Greece and Pontos living in Cyprus, revealed that Pontian, Bulgarian and Romanian women faced difficulties in securing living accommodation as most landlords did not want to rent to them.

Roma

In 1999-2000, a large number of Roma migrated from the Turkish-Cypriot controlled north of Cyprus to the south. Once they crossed over, most of them settled in abandoned and derelict properties within old Turkish quarter of Limassol which the Turkish Cypriots were forced to vacate several decades ago. Many of these houses were without doors or windows, sanitary system, electricity or water supply. By 2003, approximately 360 Roma persons had settled in these properties, without any preceding repair works.

Twelve families were regarded as trespassers, since they occupied abandoned Turkish-Cypriot homes without permit from the competent authorities, but the majority of the families were granted the necessary permits, despite the bad state of repair of these houses;³⁶¹ a study carried out by the Welfare Office in 2001 found that most houses were derelict and recommended that they be demolished because they were hazardous and dangerous for their inhabitants.³⁶² Various newspaper reports have also pointed to the squalor and poverty of these houses.³⁶³

The arrival of the Roma families in the south 1990-2000 was greeted with fear and suspicion by the local communities as well as by the authorities.³⁶⁴ The then Minister of Justice alleged in a public statement that the Roma families may well be 'Turkish spies'³⁶⁵ whilst the then Minister of the Interior assured Greek-Cypriots that the authorities would "ensure that they will be moved to an area that is far away from any place where there are people living."³⁶⁶

³⁶⁰ The method used was eight focus groups lasting from 90 minutes to two hours. The results of the survey were presented in a press conference on 04.10.2010.

The Third ECRI Report on Cyprus notes that "...the Cypriot authorities have used language and displayed attitudes vis-à-vis these persons that were not conducive to defusing tensions and promoting acceptance of Roma by the local communities."³⁶⁷ At the beginning of this influx, some Roma families were detained in Central Prison; this practice was discontinued when the Attorney General ruled it as illegal.³⁶⁸

There is no special complaints mechanism for processing complaints about housing discrimination, other than the general procedure of applying to the equality body. There is also no data collection mechanism on housing discrimination instances or complaints. Low awareness of rights, illiteracy and underreporting are severely limiting the impact of anti-discrimination legislation on the Roma.

In 2004, a study conducted by an independent expert refers to 'a number of serious problems' faced by the Roma in Limassol, the most important of which being housing. The study states that 'some houses in the community lack basic necessities such as electricity and water as well as basic hygiene'; large number of individuals are crammed under the same roof and children very often share their sleeping space with their parents.³⁶⁹

Following the arrival of Roma families, a plan for their relocation and dispersing away from the urban centre of Limassol was compiled by the Interior Minister in 2002. The plan was intended to address the demands of the local communities who were opposing the settlement of the Roma in their area, rather than address the housing problem of the Roma.

In August 2002 the plan was approved by the Council of Ministers, who also approved an expenditure of CyP255,000 (approximate Euro equivalent 440,000) for its implementation. The plan was never implemented, as it met with resistance from the local communities inhabiting the areas where the Roma were to be relocated, as well as from the Roma themselves, who wanted to be close to urban centres in order to be near their places of work and also near the areas they originate from. As a result, the Roma families were left to reside in the old Turkish quarter of Limassol, where many houses continue to be in a bad state of repair.

³⁶⁹ Spyrou, S. (2004) Educational Needs of Turkish-speaking Children in Limassol, UNOPS, February-March 2004, Nicosia. Research conducted in 2003 shows that the Roma themselves consider housing to be their most serious concern (see Trimikliniotis, N. 2005 A European Dilemma: Racism, Discrimination and the Politics of Hatred in an Enlarged EU, forthcoming).

In addition, two more settlements were created in two remote villages within the Paphos district (Makounda and Polis Chrysochoos) where the housing conditions are also appalling.³⁷⁰ In her Annual Report for 2003 the Ombudsman referred to an investigation carried out by her office into these settlements where most families were residing in temporary structures set up by themselves made of corrugated iron, wood, carton and plastic and without electricity and pointed out that for the purpose of harmonisation with the EU acquis the authorities must compile an action plan using a holistic approach for eliminating ethnic segregation and for respecting the diversity of the Roma.³⁷¹ A subsequent report released by the Ombudsman on 30.06.2003 expressed concerns about the failure of the authorities to implement policies decided in March 2000 that were designed to tackle homelessness and unemployment amongst the Roma.

The report also noted that the Roma had problems accessing medical and education services in Makounda and criticized the authorities' refusal to grant Roma the rights that they should enjoy as Cypriot citizens.³⁷²

The housing policy applicable as from 2000 is to provide all Cypriot Roma with publically administered housing. This takes the form of one out of three following types:

- 'Abandoned' Turkish-Cypriot property administered by the Custodian of Turkish-Cypriot Property, which is the Minister of Interior.
- Prefabricated houses in specially designated settlements in remote areas near villages.
- Rented accommodation which is leased from the landlords to the Welfare Services Department, which then offers it to Roma for accommodation

Over the last couple of years there has been an effort to regenerate the old Turkish Cypriot quarter of Limassol and some of the old houses were repaired. Some of the houses inhabited by the Roma have been maintained and repaired by the government, but the pace of repairs is slow and the condition of the houses remains substandard and often unfit for human habitation.

Also a multi-purpose community centre was set up in the Turkish quarter, which aimed at taking action towards integrating the Roma and promoting their participation within the local community.

³⁷⁰ Although the Interior Ministry claims that it has successfully carried out a housing plan for setting up pre-fabricated units in various communities in Limassol and Paphos with all necessary facilities, hepatitis incidents in 2005 and incidents of visceral leishmaniasis in 2006 in the Roma settlement of Makounda are attributed to poor hygienic conditions in the settlement: Nanos, C. However, the building remains closed most of the time as no arrangements or budget were allocated for a full timer to be present.

Housing is an area where official data is scant and policies are non-existent. Incidents of discrimination are not reported to the Ombudsman or the Equality body, presumably because they do not feature very high up on the agenda of migrants who are facing more serious challenges in the field of employment and in securing residence permits.

Turkish Cypriots

The particular situation facing Turkish Cypriot property owners as a result of the unresolved Cyprus problem is the subject of a number of court cases,³⁷³ where the courts resort to the rigorous application of the doctrine of necessity, the legality of which is likely to be tested by the ECtHR in the near future, as a number of Turkish Cypriots are taking their property cases there in an effort to secure judgements that will allow them access to their properties in the south despite the fact that they reside in the north. In 2010 the Equality Body issued the first decision ever from a Cypriot institution that locates discrimination in the manner in which Turkish Cypriot properties are managed by the Greek Cypriot controlled state. The complaint examined the practice of requiring the approval of the Interior Minister every time a property transfer from or to a Turkish Cypriot was to take place and found this to be discriminatory.³⁷⁴

Persons with disability or aged persons

Accessibility in housing is described in the law as one of the rights of persons with disability.³⁷⁵ However it is one of the provisions of the law which become operative through the adoption of reasonable measures (listed in article 9(1) of the law) and the reasonableness of the measures is judged by taking into consideration a number of factors which clearly does not create a mandatory regime. In terms of policy, an officer from the Department for the Administration of Turkish Cypriot Properties of the Ministry of Interior, which is in charge of the properties which the Turkish Cypriots were forced to abandon between 1963-1974, informed the author that in determining the leasing of properties under their custody, the needs of disadvantaged groups as the elderly, children, the physically disabled, the terminally ill, HIV-positive individuals, persons with persistent medical problems, the mentally ill, and other vulnerable groups are prioritised.

³⁷³ In these court decisions, the Supreme Court denied the Turkish Cypriot applicants access to their properties since these were placed under the control of the "Custodian", who is the Interior Minister, pending resolution of the Cyprus problem.

4 EXCEPTIONS

4.1 Genuine and determining occupational requirements (Article 4)

Does national law provide an exception for genuine and determining occupational requirements? If so, does this comply with Article 4 of Directive 2000/43 and Article 4(1) of Directive 2000/78?

Copying the wording of both Article 4 of the Racial Equality Directive as well as Article 4(1) of the Employment Equality Directive, Article 5(2) of Law No. 58(1)³⁷⁶ (transposing the Employment Equality Directive) allows for differential treatment based on racial or ethnic origin, religion, belief, age or sexual orientation when the nature of the particular occupational activities or the context within which these are carried out is such that a specific characteristic constitutes a substantial and determining employment precondition, provided that the aim is legitimate and the requirement proportionate. Along similar lines, the Law on Persons with Disabilities (Amendment) of 2004³⁷⁷ excludes from its scope activities where, by virtue of their nature or context, a characteristic or ability which a person with a disability does not have, constitute a substantial and determining precondition, provided the aim is legitimate and the precondition is proportionate, taking into consideration the possibility of adopting 'reasonable measures'. There are a number of equality body decisions attempting to offer an interpretation of the terms 'legitimate aim' and 'proportionate precondition', which are reported above.

The Law on Public Service³⁷⁸ which used to provide that "only Cypriot citizens shall be appointed as civil servants" has been amended by replacing the term "Cypriot" with the term "European". However, a stringent Greek language requirement has been introduced, rendering it very difficult, if not impossible, for non-native Greek speakers to become members of the civil service, a measure severely criticised in several equality body decisions. The requirement provides that all non-university graduates and all graduates from non-Greek speaking universities must undergo a Greek proficiency test the standard of which is very high. Furthermore, although Turkish is an official language of the Republic, there is no provision for native Turkish-speakers accessing the civil service on the basis of their own language: they also have to undergo the Greek proficiency test.³⁷⁹

4.2 Employers with an ethos based on religion or belief (Art. 4(2) Directive 2000/78)

a) Does national law provide an exception for employers with an ethos based on religion or belief? If so, does this comply with Article 4(2) of Directive 2000/78?

³⁷⁶ Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation of 2004 No. 58 (1)/2004 (31.3.2004).

³⁷⁷ Law on Persons with Disabilities No. 57(I)2004 (31.03.2004), Section 4(1), amending Section 3A(b) of the basic law.

³⁷⁸ Public Service Law 1/90.

³⁷⁹ Article 123 of the Cyprus Constitution, which provides that 30% of the public service positions must be given to Turkish-Cypriots, has been defunct since 1963.

Copying verbatim part of Article 4(2) of the Employment Equality Directive, Article 7 of Law No. 58(1)³⁸⁰ provides that in the case of occupational activities of churches or other public or private organisations the ethos of which is based on religion or belief, a difference of treatment based on a person's religion or belief shall not constitute discrimination when, due to the nature or context of these activities, religion or belief are a genuine, legitimate and justified occupational requirement, having regard to the organisation's ethos.

Article 110 of the Cypriot Constitution provides for complete autonomy of the established religious organisations/churches of the two Cypriot communities, the Christian Orthodox church for the Greeks and the Vakf for the Muslim Turks. Under Article 110.1, the "Autocephalous Greek-Orthodox Church of Cyprus" has "the exclusive right of regulating and administering its own internal affairs and property in accordance with the Holy Canons and its charter in force for the time being and the Greek Communal Chamber shall not act inconsistently with such right". Similarly, under Article 110.2 "the institution of Vakf and the Principles and Laws of, and relating to, Vakfs are recognised by this constitution".³⁸¹ From the above Article it is apparent that the extent of the autonomy and right to self-regulation granted to the Church under the Constitution is wider than that allowed by Article 7 of Law 58(I)/2004 (transposing Article 4(2) of the Employment Equality Directive). Pursuant to a law which came into force in July 2006 amending the Constitution to the effect that that EU directives and regulations prevail over national legislation (including the Constitution), it can safely be assumed that the provisions of Law 58(I)/2004 will prevail over the Constitution as the former transposes an EU Directive.

b) Are there any specific provisions or case law in this area relating to conflicts between the rights of organisations with an ethos based on religion or belief and other rights to non-discrimination? (e.g. organisations with an ethos based on religion v. sexual orientation or other ground.)

There is no case law in Cyprus based on this provision. The autonomy of religious organisations may be subject to compatibility with the new anti-discrimination laws, however, this is part of the wider constitutional questions that go the heart of the Cyprus problem. One may safely assume that non-Orthodox Christians are excluded from employment in positions in church organisations since they cannot become priests in the orthodox church of Cyprus; women are excluded since they are not allowed to become priests anyway and homosexuals are excluded too as homosexuality continues to be considered by the church as a sin. In practice, organisations with an ethos based on religion, such as the Bishoprics, often have no hesitation in hiring Muslims or Catholics for manual jobs such as working in the fields owned by the Bishoprics.³⁸²

³⁸² Interview with Petros Lazarou, secretary of the Morphou Bishopric, 16.01.2005.

Under article 7 of Law N. 58(I)/2004, “in the case of occupational activities within churches and other public or private organisations the ethos of which is based on religion or belief, a difference of treatment based on a person's religion or belief shall not constitute discrimination where, by reason of the nature of these activities or of the context in which they are carried out, a person's religion or belief constitute a genuine, legitimate and justified occupational requirement, having regard to the organisation's ethos”. This exception does not cover sexual orientation and the scope of this Law does not cover gender. Therefore, any difference in treatment at the workplace on the ground of gender or sexual orientation is unlawful. In the case of religion, difference in treatment is lawful if the test laid down in article 7 of Law 58(I)/2004 is satisfied.

Also, following the amendment of the constitution giving supremacy to EU law, the leeway provided by the Directive which provides that “this difference of treatment shall be implemented taking account of Member States' constitutional provisions and principles, as well as the general principles of Community law” can be argued to have been further curtailed. Moreover, given that the Directive explicitly stipulates that such treatment “should not justify discrimination on another ground,” it could be argued that any different treatment that relates to any ground other than religion, whether direct or indirect, is discriminatory and thus unlawful. So far there has been no case law on the subject.

- c) Are there cases where religious institutions are permitted to select people (on the basis of their religion) to hire or to dismiss from a job when that job is in a state entity, or in an entity financed by the State (e.g. the Catholic church in Italy or Spain can select religious teachers in state schools)? What are the conditions for such selection? Is this possibility provided for by national law only, or international agreements with the Holy See, or a combination of both?

There are no provisions under which religious institutions can openly and officially select persons for any position, although there is public discourse on church intervention particularly at schools and criticisms against the church for trying to interfere with selection of candidates for a job placement and with the hiring process either by using its influence or by financing positions at the University of Cyprus in order to be filled by a person of their choice.

Given that by far the most powerful of religious institutions in Cyprus is the Greek-orthodox church, and the dominant community in Cyprus is the Greek Cypriot, whose members are mostly of Greek orthodox religion, the issue of conflict or contestation does not often arise; the intervention of the Greek orthodox church, where such intervention takes place, is rather intended to promote a particular person for a specific job for reasons which are not exclusively of a religious nature, given that the Cypriot church operates businesses of significant capital such as banks and hotels. There is no publicly known incident where the church refused to hire a person on account of his/her religion, but given the all-powerful position of the church in Cyprus it is not very likely that many persons of non Christian orthodox faith would have applied for such positions.

4.3 Armed forces and other specific occupations (Art. 3(4) and Recital 18 Directive 2000/78)

- a) Does national law provide for an exception for the armed forces in relation to age or disability discrimination (Article 3(4), Directive 2000/78)?

The Law regarding persons with Disabilities does not apply to the armed forces, to the extent that the nature of the occupation is such that it requires special skills which cannot be exercised by persons with disabilities.³⁸³ The same exception will appear as a reservation by the Republic of Cyprus in the ratification of the U.N. Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, expected to be ratified in 2011.

Also, Law 58(I)/2004³⁸⁴ transposing the Employment Equality Directive provides that the prohibition of discrimination on the ground of age shall not apply to the armed forces, to the extent that the fixing of an age limit is justified by the nature and the duties of the occupation.

- b) Are there any provisions or exceptions relating to employment in the police, prison or emergency services (Recital 18, Directive 2000/78)?

A new law which came into effect in late 2009 introducing a quota system in favour of persons with disability in the wider public sector excludes from its scope those sections of the public service where "all physical, mental or intellectual restrictions must necessarily be absent", which are the army, the police, the fire department and the prisons.³⁸⁵

4.4 Nationality discrimination (Art. 3(2))

Both the Racial Equality Directive and the Employment Equality Directive include exceptions relating to difference of treatment based on nationality (Article 3(2) in both Directives).

- a) *How does national law treat nationality discrimination? Does this include stateless status?
What is the relationship between 'nationality' and 'race or ethnic origin', in particular in the context of indirect discrimination?
Is there overlap in case law between discrimination on grounds of nationality and ethnicity (i.e. where nationality discrimination may constitute ethnic discrimination as well?)*

³⁸⁴ Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation of 2004 No. 58 (1)/2004 (31.3.2004), Section 8(4).

³⁸⁵ Law introducing special provisions for the hiring of persons with a disabilities in the wider public sector 146(I)/2009, article 2.

Copying verbatim the wording of article 3(2) in both Directives, the laws transposing the two Directives exclude from their scope differential treatment due to nationality and do not affect the provisions and preconditions concerning entry, stay and treatment of third country nationals and stateless persons.

However, nationality is a protected ground by virtue of article 1 of Protocol No. 12 to the ECHR which provides for freedom from discrimination on the grounds of, inter alia, national or social origin, association with a national minority birth or other status. This Protocol was embodied into national legislation on 19.04.2002 as Law 13(III)/2002. No reference is made in this law to stateless persons.

A similar provision is also to be found in the law appointing the Ombudsman as the Equality Body³⁸⁶ which bestows the Ombudsman with the task of promoting equality in the enjoyment of rights and freedoms arising under international instruments ratified by Cyprus, irrespective of, inter alia, national or ethnic origin and of protecting individuals from discrimination by public as well as by private bodies on the grounds provided in the law, which include nationality. No reference is made in this law to stateless persons either.

In its decisions, the equality body has made use of its extended mandate and considered nationality discrimination as prohibited by international laws; in some occasions nationality and ethnic origin has been used interchangeably, in the sense that whilst the case at stake was clearly one of nationality discrimination, the decision would also invoke the provisions of the laws transposing the anti-discrimination directives. An equality body decision has established that the exclusion of non-Cypriot EU citizens from a scheme of granting heating allowance amounted to discrimination on the basis of race or ethnic origin as well as of national origin under Protocol 12 to the ECHR.³⁸⁷ Similarly, the exclusion of a Greek national from the list of persons eligible to be awarded honorary artistic pensions was found by the equality body to be discriminatory.³⁸⁸ Also, the denial of access to EU citizens to the electoral register for the purpose of voting at local elections was held to be discriminatory on the basis of race or ethnic origin.³⁸⁹

b) Are there exceptions in anti-discrimination law that seek to rely on Article 3(2)?

Law 57(I)/2004 on persons with disabilities does not apply to differential treatment due to nationality and does not affect provisions and requirements relating to the entry and stay of third country nationals and stateless persons in Cyprus or the treatment arising from the legal status of such persons.³⁹⁰

Identical provisions are also to be found in Law No.59(I)/2004³⁹¹ transposing the Employment Equality Directive and in Law 59(I)/2004³⁹² transposing the Racial Equality Directive. When viewed independently, the reference to differential treatment due to nationality may appear to contradict the main prohibition of race discrimination. However, the fact that this reference is part of the same sentence with the reference to the conditions of entry and stay of third country nationals and stateless persons, may lead to the interpretation that differential treatment due to nationality is permitted only in relation to the conditions of entry and stay of third country nationals.

Several decisions by the Ombudsman have criticised a number of practices of the Population-data Archives Department (part of the Interior Ministry) in the process of granting citizenship. In particular, criticism is directed against the restrictive approach of the Director of the Population-data Archives (immigration department) as regards the acquisition of citizenship via registration and naturalisation; particularly critical are the decisions regarding the rejections of applications for citizenship based on marriage with Cypriots.³⁹³ The decisions also highlight considerable delay in processing the applications, prejudice due to religion of the applicant and the exercise of administrative discretion regarding the interpretation of the regulation that excludes those who have entered the country illegally from acquiring citizenship.³⁹⁴

The equality body's decisions however may take a different stand where the ever present 'Cyprus problem' is involved. On 16.01.2007 a complaint was submitted to the equality body alleging that the law on the acquisition of citizenship by descent is discriminatory. The said law provides that children born to parents, one of whom unlawfully entered or resides in the Republic, do not automatically become citizens of Cyprus even if the other parent holds or would have been entitled to Cypriot citizenship; that these children can become citizens only following a decision of the Council of Ministers.³⁹⁵ This provision is intended to vest the Council of Ministers with the power to decide whether or not to grant nationality to children born to a Turkish Cypriot parent and a Turkish parent, where the latter is deemed to fall within the category of "Turkish settlers". The complaint alleged that the said provision was discriminatory contrary to the Constitution and international obligations of the Republic, as the rendering of a child's nationality conditional on the status of 'legality' or 'illegality' of the parents, or even worse of one of the two parents, not only violates the rights of the child, as provided for in the UN Convention for the Rights of the Child, but also constitutes discrimination against the children who are victimised by the political situation and whom the Republic has an obligation to protect.

³⁹⁵ Art. 109 Population-data Archives Law No. 141(I)/2002. This clause was first introduced by Law 65(I)/1999 that came into force on 11 June 1999.

Due to the lack of transparency in these procedures, it is not possible to assess the impact or to monitor implementation of this law. The equality body's decision³⁹⁶ recognised that the examination of applications under the said provision are often unnecessarily delayed and reported that the Council of Ministers had adopted the equality body's recommendations in establishing that the right to nationality is guaranteed to children who:

- Were born on or before 20.07.1974 (date of the Turkish military invasion in Cyprus),
- One parent is a Cypriot and the other is an EU or third country national excluding Turkish nationals;
- The parents got married outside Cyprus or in Cyprus before 20/07/1974; The Turkish-Cypriot parent had a relationship with the Turkish national irrespective of the events of 1974 (because of studying or working abroad).
- The parents reside in the mixed village of Pyla.³⁹⁷

The decision adds that given that the Council of Minister's decision is governmental policy, it cannot intervene any further, although it does not explain why. It is apparent that the allegation for discrimination was not examined and that the equality body readily accepts that children may legitimately be discriminated against when one of the two parents entered Cyprus under the status of the "Turkish settler".

The Third ECRI Report on Cyprus³⁹⁸ notes that 'decisions to grant nationality have resulted in intolerant and xenophobic attitudes in public debate'.³⁹⁹ It was argued that the relevant provisions of the nationality law are contrary to art. 5 of the 1997 European Convention on Nationality, which Cyprus is yet to sign and which both the Second and Third ECRI Reports on Cyprus recommend that Cyprus signs and ratifies. It was also argued that the said provision is contrary to the general prohibition of discrimination as laid down in article 1 of Protocol 12 to the ECHR, which has been ratified by the Republic of Cyprus and which falls within the equality body's mandate.

4.5 Work-related family benefits (Recital 22 Directive 2000/78)

Some employers, both public and private, provide benefits to employees in respect of their partners. For example, an employer might provide employees with free or subsidised private health insurance, covering both the employees and their partners. Certain employers limit these benefits to the married partners (e.g. Case C-267/06 Maruko) or unmarried opposite-sex partners of employees. This question aims to establish how national law treats such practices.

Please note: this question is focused on benefits provided by the employer. We are not looking for information on state social security arrangements.

- a) Would it constitute unlawful discrimination in national law if an employer provides benefits that are limited to those employees who are married?

The payment of work-related family benefits by employers is not expressly regulated by law in either the public or the private sector. In order to determine the legality of any provision or non-provision of work-related benefits, recourse must be made to the general anti-discrimination principles contained in the framework legislation. 'Family condition' is included in the prohibited grounds of discrimination in Article 28 of the Constitution which, under the Yiallourou case⁴⁰⁰ is applicable per se both in the public and the private sector. Apart from those sectors in which collective agreements are in force, all other benefits provided by employers must be considered as part of the employment contract, the conditions of which may legitimately vary from employee to employee. In practice, both in the private as well as in the public sector, free or subsidised medical care schemes are commonly made available to employees' spouses. This may result in unfavourable treatment of the unmarried employees; furthermore the granting of benefits to married couples only, amounts to indirect discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation, given that same sex couples are unable to marry in Cyprus. The principle established by the ECJ in the Maruko case, which precludes legislation depriving the surviving partner from a survivor's benefit equivalent to that granted to a surviving spouse, may presumably be used in order to afford same sex partners in a long term albeit unregistered relationship, the same benefits as regards pensions with those accruing to married spouses.

Regulation 12 of the Educational Officers (Placements, Transfers and Movements) regulations of 1987 to 1994 sets the family condition of the employee (i.e. whether he/she is married and has dependent children) as one of the criteria in determining whether such employee will be transferred to a teaching post away from his/her base.

A decision of the Equality body regarding this provision found that the differential treatment of unmarried employees vis-à-vis married employees without children amounts to indirect discrimination against persons who remain single out of personal conviction, or who choose to co-habit with their partners outside marriage or who do not marry due to their sexual orientation, in other words it amounts to discrimination on the ground of belief and/or sexual orientation. Thus the Equality body asked for this regulation to be revised⁴⁰¹ but until the date of writing no steps had been taken in that direction.

⁴⁰¹ Report of the Equality body No. A.K.I 11/2004.

Law No. 59(I)/2004 transposing the Racial Equality Directive is stated to apply inter alia in the areas of “social protection, health care, social provision...[and] access to goods and services available to the public”⁴⁰². However, Law No. 58(I)/2004 transposing the employment Directive is expressly stated not to apply to any type of provisions paid by public provision schemes or schemes similar to those, including public schemes of social insurance or social protection, except professional social insurance schemes. An exception to the exception is provided in the same provision, according to which differential treatment in any of the mentioned areas on the ground of racial or ethnic origin is not covered by the exception and presumably constitutes unlawful discrimination.⁴⁰³ The same law also provides that the fixing of age limits as far as pensions or disability benefits are concerned shall not constitute discrimination provided it does not result in discrimination on the ground of sex.⁴⁰⁴

b) Would it constitute unlawful discrimination in national law if an employer provides benefits that are limited to those employees with opposite-sex partners?

Common law marriage is not recognised in Cyprus so where benefits are available to married employees, these would necessarily apply to couples married in accordance with the law. From this perspective, same-sex and opposite sex unmarried couples are not treated differently by employers, although it should be added that homosexuality, decriminalised in Cyprus only after the relevant decision of the ECtHR against the Cypriot government,⁴⁰⁵ continues to be a taboo subject, with only a handful of homosexuals being ‘out of the closet’.

4.6 Health and safety (Art. 7(2) Directive 2000/78)

a) Are there exceptions in relation to disability and health and safety (Article 7(2), Directive 2000/78)?

Law 57(I)/2004 on persons with disabilities is stated not to affect any measures for, inter alia, the protection of “health and the rights and freedoms of others”⁴⁰⁶. The same law further provides that the principle of equal treatment does not prevent the maintaining or introduction of regulations for the protection of health and safety at the workplace, or measures aimed at creating or maintaining requirements or facilities intended to preserve or encourage the inclusion of persons with disabilities.⁴⁰⁷

Law 58(I)/2004 transposing the Employment Equality Directive is also stated not to affect measures provided by national legislation necessary for, inter alia, the “protection of health and the rights and freedoms of others”, unless the differential treatment is due to a person’s racial or ethnic origin, in which case it presumably constitutes unlawful discrimination.⁴⁰⁸

4.7 Exceptions related to discrimination on the ground of age (Art. 6 Directive 2000/78)

4.7.1 Direct discrimination

- a) Is it possible, generally, or in specified circumstances, to justify direct discrimination on the ground of age? If so, is the test compliant with the test in Article 6, Directive 2000/78, account being taken of the European Court of Justice in the Case C-144/04, Mangold?

Law 58(I)/2004 transposing the Employment Equality Directive copies verbatim the whole provision in Article 6⁴¹³ of the said Directive and it may thus be possible that the law does allow for direct discrimination on the ground of age. However, the law setting out the mandate of the equality body⁴¹⁴ does not contain these exceptions. No case has been decided on the subject, neither in court, nor by the Equality body. The CJEU case C-144/04, Mangold is binding authority on Cypriot courts and can be relied upon in the future.

A series of Court decisions in recent years have sought to justify differences in retirement ages for different employees, introducing a rather wide spectrum of exceptions premised upon a doctrine that 'unequal' situations must be treated differently. The cases are reported above in section 0.3 of this Report.

- b) Does national law permit differences of treatment based on age for any activities within the material scope of Directive 2000/78?

Although the exception of Article 6(2) is not specifically invoked, there are provisions in the law regulating the payment of benefits under pension schemes in the public service, which depend at least partly on age. In particular, the Law Amending the Pensions Laws of 1997-2001 N. 59(I)2005 provides that the lump sum payable to public servants upon retirement is paid upon the attainment of certain ages in combination with the completion of a certain term of service. Entitlement to other benefits is linked to the term of service but also, in some cases, to the mandatory pensionable age, which is determined by this law.

Besides this law, there is a long list of laws regulating the payment of benefits under pension schemes to employees in the various governmental and semi-governmental bodies, most of which follow the pattern of the aforesaid law, i.e. benefits become payable upon completion of a certain term of service and/or upon attainment of a certain age and/or upon attainment of pensionable age. A decision of the equality body in 2009 found that the provision of the Pensions Law providing for fewer benefits for employees under 45 wishing to take early retirement, compared with employees over 45, was in violation of the equality principle.

⁴¹³ Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation of 2004 No. 58 (1)/2004 (31.3.2004), Section 8.

⁴¹⁴ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/2004 (19.03.2004), section 3(1)(b).

The equality body, however, appears willing to accept the criterion of the number of years in service as a determining factor differentiating groups of employees, which is also indirectly related to age.⁴¹⁵

In the private sector, pension schemes are regulated either by collective agreements (where such exist in the particular sector) or by private employment contracts or by the Law on Provident Funds⁴¹⁶ where benefits are paid under a provident fund. In the first two cases, it is impossible to monitor the conditions of eligibility for benefits under these schemes. In the case of provident funds, the relevant law prohibits discrimination only on the ground of sex but it is possible that any private provident fund which discriminates on other grounds will be held unlawful on the basis of article 4(c) of Law 58(I)/2004, transposing article 3.1(c) of the Employment Equality Directive on conditions of employment, subject of course to the exception in article 6(2) of the Directive (transposed by article 8(3) of Law 58(I)/2004).

- c) Does national legislation allow occupational pension schemes to fix ages for admission to the scheme or entitlement to benefits, taking up the possibility provided for by article 6(2) ?

As indicated in the preceding paragraph, in the public sector benefits under pension schemes depend at least partly on age. In the private sector, pension schemes are regulated either by collective agreements (where such exist in the particular sector) or by private employment contracts or by the Law on Provident Funds⁴¹⁷ where benefits are paid under a provident fund. In the first two cases, it is impossible to monitor the conditions of eligibility for benefits under these schemes. In the case of provident funds, the relevant law prohibits discrimination only on the ground of sex but it is possible that any private provident fund which discriminates on other grounds will be held to be acting unlawfully on the basis of article 4(c) of Law 58(I)/2004, transposing article 3.1(c) of the Employment Equality Directive on conditions of employment, subject of course to the exception in article 6(2) of the Directive (transposed by article 8(3) of Law 58(I)/2004).

4.7.2 Special conditions for young people, older workers and persons with caring responsibilities

Are there any special conditions set by law for older or younger workers in order to promote their vocational integration, or for persons with caring responsibilities to ensure their protection? If so, please describe these.

⁴¹⁵ Decision Reference number A.K.I. 63/2008 και A.K.I. 1/2009, dated 04.06.2009. The report states that the aim of this provision could have been served by introducing a condition that pension benefits are payable upon completion of certain years of service irrespective of age. The case is reported under section 0.3 above.

⁴¹⁶ Law Regulating the Setting-up, Operation and Registration of Provident Funds (1981-2005) N.44/81.

⁴¹⁷ Law Regulating the Setting-up, Operation and Registration of Provident Funds (1981-2005) N.44/81.

Law 58(I)/2004 transposing the Employment Equality Directive provides that differential treatment in the form of special conditions for access to employment and vocational training, employment and occupation including dismissal and remuneration conditions, for young and old persons and for working persons with dependents, so as to promote their vocational integration or ensure their protection, shall not constitute discrimination. However, no such measures or special conditions are actually provided by this law or by any other law or regulation. A 2010 decision of the Equality Body has established the principle expounded by the CJEU in the Coleman case that discrimination against a person with caring responsibilities towards a person with disability is discrimination prohibited by law.⁴¹⁸ This principle has also found its way in the Code of Conduct for disability discrimination at the workplace issued by the Equality Body in September 2010 which has binding effect.⁴¹⁹

4.7.3 Minimum and maximum age requirements

Are there exceptions permitting minimum and/or maximum age requirements in relation to access to employment (notably in the public sector) and training?

There is evidence that in practice older workers face discrimination when it comes to new appointments, with many employers specifying in job advertisement upper age limit of new recruits,⁴²⁰ in spite of the law prohibiting such age limits. Furthermore, there is evidence that employers are very often reluctant even to interview applicants who are older unemployed workers and it would not be surprising to find that age discrimination is practiced across the board, as until recently it was not considered to be discriminatory and therefore there is still no monitoring mechanism in place six years after the enactment of the law prohibiting age discrimination.

Since the enactment of the new laws, a number of age discrimination complaints were submitted to the equality body, some of which concerned age limits fixed with regard to access to employment in the public sector. When the equality body found in favour of the complainant in one case,⁴²¹ the age limit condition in another case was revoked from the job description before this second complaint was processed by the Equality body. However, by the time that the age limit was revoked, the deadline for submitting applications for employment was already closed. The equality body pointed out that the revocation of the age limit provision would be given more substance if the same employment position was re-advertised without the age limit

⁴¹⁸ Equality Body report dated 25.06.2010, Ref. A.K.I. 82/2009, reported in section 0.3. above.

⁴¹⁹ The Code is available in Greek at http://www.no-discrimination.ombudsman.gov.cy/sites/default/files/kodikas_gia_diakriseis_logo_anapirias_ergasia.pdf

⁴²⁰ The only research undertaken is a paper by House 1992 which discusses the problems of older workers in the labour force generally.

⁴²¹ The case involved a post for the Public Education Commission, which had a statutory upper age limit, whilst an equivalent post in the Public Commission did not contain such a restriction (File AKI 25/2004).

condition, to enable persons aged over the previously imposed age limit to apply. This recommendation was complied with and the position was re-advertised. A number of cases were decided by the equality body which prohibits the setting of an upper age limit for the recruitment of persons in the Civil Service and the cooperative banks. In fact the only single Court judgement relying on the laws transposing the acquis concerns the fixing of an upper age limit by a credit institution, which upon examination of the merits the Court found unlawful.⁴²²

The Ministry of Labour has advised that the District Labour Offices do not accept announcements for vacancies by employers that set age limits and that the managers of newspapers were informed by the Department of Labour that setting age as a criterion for hiring in a job vacancy announcement is prohibited. The Ministry did not specify the date that this measure was introduced; given the above instances of vacancy announcements with age limits, one may presume that either this measure was introduced very recently or that it is not yielding the intended results. The Ministry has not specified if there are any sanctions against newspapers/employers advertising jobs with an age limit but given the language used (they are 'informed' that it is unlawful) it is likely that no measures are taken against them. In 2009 the Equality Body carried out an information campaign addressing discrimination contained in job advertisements by sending out letters to stakeholders informing of the provisions of the law. Although orally the officers of the Equality Body informed the author that the campaign addressed discrimination on all grounds, the Annual Report of the Equality Authority records that the campaign was aimed at eliminating gender discrimination.⁴²³

Following the enactment of the new law in late 2009 introducing quotas in favour of persons with disability, a blind person wrote to the Labour Minister to complain that another governmental department refused to offer him a job in violation of the quota imposed by the new law. In response, the Labour Minister explained that her ministry lacks competency to interfere with decisions of other departments. The incident is indicative of the impact of the lack of enforcement mechanism, which applies to all grounds and all fields.

The only exceptions permitting minimum or maximum age requirements in Cyprus law are the ones listed in Article 8 of Law 58(I)/2004 which, as stated above, are a direct copy of the provisions in Article 6 of the Employment Equality Directive. In addition, the Cypriot law provides an exception relating to the armed forces, whereby the principle of non-discrimination on the ground of age is stated to be inapplicable in the armed forces to the extent that the fixing of an age limit is justified by the nature and the duties of the work.⁴²⁴ The law does not specify the age limit applicable in this case, which is determined by the service schemes of the armed forces.

Also, the new law setting quotas in favour of persons with disability excludes army, the police, the fire department and the prisons from the ambit of the law.⁴²⁵

4.7.4 Retirement

In this question it is important to distinguish between pensionable age (the age set by the state, or by employers or by collective agreements, at which individuals become entitled to a state pension, as distinct from the age at which individuals actually retire from work), and mandatory retirement ages (which can be state-imposed, employer-imposed, imposed by an employee's employment contract or imposed by a collective agreement).

For these questions, please indicate whether the ages are different for women and men.

- a) Is there a state pension age, at which individuals must begin to collect their state pensions? Can this be deferred if an individual wishes to work longer, or can a person collect a pension and still work?

Civil/public servants and public employees receive two types of pensions, one from the Social Insurance Scheme, which is based on the social insurance contributions they have paid during their working lives and an additional one called State Pension, which is state funded and does not depend on contributions. The Social Insurance pension begins at 63, which is dependent on contributions,⁴²⁶ whilst the State pension becomes payable upon retirement at the age of retirement or under the early retirement scheme. As soon as the Social Insurance pension is activated, the State pension is reduced by an equivalent amount.

In order to be entitled to a full pension, public servants⁴²⁷ have to complete 32 and 1/3 years of service, but there is provision for early retirement at 55 years at a reduced pension. Public servants and employees have the option to receive a retirement lump sum and a reduced pension, or receive a higher pension.⁴²⁸

Pension schemes of semi-governmental bodies and teachers in public education schools used the civil service model, but they are contributory pension schemes.

- b) Is there a normal age when people can begin to receive payments from occupational pension schemes and other employer-funded pension arrangements? Can payments from such occupational pension schemes be deferred if an individual wishes to work longer, or can an individual collect a pension and still work?

⁴²⁵ Law introducing special provisions for the hiring of persons with a disabilities in the wider public sector 146(I)/2009.

⁴²⁷ The actual amount for the full pension depends on scales etc.

⁴²⁸ This applies to all those who are part of the Pension scheme.

There is no fixed 'normal age' for such arrangements; it depends on each scheme. It is possible for an individual to collect a pension and continue to work.

- c) Is there a state-imposed mandatory retirement age(s)? Please state whether this is generally applicable or only in respect of certain sectors, and if so please state which. Have there been recent changes in this respect or are any planned in the near future?

Retirement age in Cyprus is statutory only for the civil servants and it is fixed at sixty-three for both the governmental as well as the semi-governmental sector (except teachers in public education). Up to 2005, for public servants the retirement age was 60, but it was extended to 63 following an agreement between the Government and the public service trade union, PASYDY, which was followed by an amendment in the laws on Pensions⁴²⁹ and on Public Service.⁴³⁰

The new law provides for the gradual extension of the mandatory retirement age to 63 for all those already in service, but for the new recruits the 63 age will be compulsory.⁴³¹ A Supreme Court decision issued in 2007⁴³² found that the different retirement age for employees of different ages does not amount to age discrimination.

Late retirement is prohibited by law for civil servants, public employees, semi-governmental organisations employees and employees of public education institutions.

A government proposal to extend retirement age for teachers in public education, who are civil servants, from the age of 60 to 63, was rejected in a referendum and therefore retirement age remained at 60. The proposal provided for voluntary extension for those currently in employment. Early retirement, which is currently available at 55 was to be extended to 58. The proposal was opposed by many teachers' trade unions, who feared that the move (a) would have a negative effect on the employment of younger graduates, who face long periods of unemployment until there is a vacancy, (b) would have a negative effect on education, and (c) would be associated with an extension of teaching hours, something already proposed by the Ministry of Education, as the proposal is only the beginning of a process that will undermine working conditions and the terms of employment of teachers.⁴³³

⁴³¹ In particular, the retirement age fixed by article 4A of the Pensions Law of 1967 N.9/67, as amended by Law N.69(Ι)/2005, is as follows: The age of 63 for those who attain the age of 60 on or after 01.07.2008; the age of 62 for those who attain the age of 60 between 01.01.2007-30.06.2008; the age of 61 for those who attain the age of 60 between 01.07.2005-31.12.2006.

⁴³³ See the relevant press release of the Coordinating Committee Against the Extension of the Age Limit in Education, 24.1.2005.

- d) Does national law permit employers to set retirement ages (or ages at which the termination of an employment contract is possible) by contract, collective bargaining or unilaterally?

There is no statutory retirement age in Cyprus for employees in the private sector. However, the majority of private sector workers retire on their 65th year, which is the pensionable age prescribed by the Social Insurance Law.

- e) Does the law on protection against dismissal and other laws protecting employment rights apply to all workers irrespective of age, if they remain in employment, or are these rights lost on attaining pensionable age or another age (please specify)?

Mandatory retirement age is fixed only in the public service and is the same for men and women. Employees in the private sector usually retire at sixty-five although they are not legally compelled to do so. In the nationalised industries it is permissible to extend one's retirement age with the consent of the employer, in which case the retirement age is regulated by the employment contract or the collective agreement, if such exists in the particular field. However, under s.4 of the Law on Termination of Employment, the right to protection from unfair dismissal is lost upon reaching pensionable age. This effectively means that the employer is free to dismiss an employee or force him/her to retire at any time after he/she has reached pensionable age without having to pay any compensation. A complaint was submitted to the Equality body in 2005 alleging that loss of protection from unfair dismissal for persons who have reached either their pensionable or their retirement age amounts to unlawful discrimination on the ground of age. The Ministry of Labour defended the said legal provision on the following grounds:

- Differences of treatment on the grounds of age are permitted under article 6 of the Directive (which is copied verbatim as section 8(1) of Law 58(I)/2004) as a measure that is 'objectively and reasonably justified'. The employment policy goal of creating jobs for young persons by replacing the ones who have completed their cycle of work is, according to the Ministry, 'objectively and reasonably justified' and thus legitimate.
- The age of 65 is not an arbitrary one; it was chosen because it is the retirement age for the purposes of both the Social Insurance law and the Social Pension law, which provide the employee with pension benefits.
- The said legal provision creates an incentive for employers to employ senior /older persons, thus serving the policy goal of extending the duration of the professional life of senior citizens who are willing to continue working.

In fact, in Cyprus, there is a problem of unemployment amongst the young (under the age of 30)⁴³⁴ and for the ages 55 to 65.⁴³⁵ The goal of introducing measures for the employment of over 65 seems rather odd under the current conditions in Cyprus. Moreover, there is a more serious legal issue, rather than one of employment strategy. The case of CJEU decision C-144/04, Mangold is relevant here. The logic of the decision applies to the situation of losing the right to unfair dismissal: Similar to the case in the Cypriot context, the goal in the Mangold case was to encourage employment amongst the older people. However, as with Mangold the goal cannot be objectively justifiable and it is similarly going beyond what is the appropriate and necessary to achieve the goal. The fear of the CJEU that older workers will be excluded from the benefits of stable employment solely on the basis of age applies equally to the denial of the right to compensation for unfair dismissal.

In 2007, the equality body found the said legal provision discriminatory and referred it to the Attorney General in order for him to prepare the amending law to rectify this problem, however no measures towards this aim have been taken yet and the said provision continues to remain in force.⁴³⁶

4.7.5 Redundancy

a) Does national law permit age or seniority to be taken into account in selecting workers for redundancy?

The Termination of Employment Laws 1967-1994 which govern issues relating to redundancy do not provide for seniority or age to be taken into account in selecting workers for redundancy. However, there is extensive case law evidencing that the principle of “first in- last out” is accepted by the Courts and is used as a criterion for determining whether the right worker or workers have been selected for redundancy.

In a significant number of cases, there is a collective agreement in force explicitly providing for this principle, which however must be used in conjunction with the ability and efficiency of a particular worker, in other words the provision in the collective agreement states that the person to be made redundant must be the last one appointed, having taken into account significant differences in the ability and efficiency of the work of the workers who are about to be dismissed.⁴³⁷

⁴³⁴ See the Cyprus Labour Institute study on the job insecurity of the young workers in Cyprus, for the Cyprus Youth Board (2004-2005).

⁴³⁵ See Cyprus Statistical service for the unemployment rates in Cyprus. For an analysis of unemployment see the Cyprus Labour Institute (2006) Annual Review of the Economy and Employment for 2005, INEK-PEO.

⁴³⁶ The equality body's decision is discussed above in section 0.3 of this report.

⁴³⁷ Andreas Hadjidemetriou v. 1. Publishing company "To Vima" Ltd, 2. Redundancy Fund, 107/85.

All other things being equal, however, the Court will apply the principle of “first in-last out”⁴³⁸ although in other instances the Court has ruled that seniority alone cannot prevent the selection of a worker for redundancy.⁴³⁹

b) If national law provides compensation for redundancy, is this affected by the age of the worker?

The general rule of law is that the following criteria are used to determine the amount of compensation payable in the case of redundancy: the number of years of service in the same employer;⁴⁴⁰ whether the period of employment was before 01.01.1964, as no compensation is payable for work before that date;⁴⁴¹ whether employment was continuous;⁴⁴² and the amount of weekly salary earned.⁴⁴³ It may be argued that some of these criteria may, by inference, be indirectly related to age.

Article 19(1) of the Termination of Employment Law provides that redundancy does not generate the right to compensation if the worker so dismissed was of retirement age on the date of termination of his/her employment.

Also, in accordance with Article 19(2) of the same law, when a worker’s employment is terminated within twelve months prior to his/her retirement age, the amount of compensation payable is reduced by one twelfth for every completed month of age during this 12-month period.

There are a number of cases decided by the Courts where age was used as a criterion in order to assess the worker’s application for compensation from the redundancy fund where there was an offer by the employer for an alternative job position. In the case of a 58-year old stock-keeper who was made redundant but was offered by the same employer an alternative position as a door-to-door salesman, the Courts held that due to his advanced age he was right to reject that offer and was therefore entitled to compensation.⁴⁴⁴ Similarly, a middle aged woman who was offered by her employer an alternative position at another location, which involved thirty minutes’ walk from her residence, was held by the Courts as reasonable in rejecting it and was therefore entitled to compensation.⁴⁴⁵ By contrast, a young woman who rejected her employer’s offer for an alternative position which involved thirty minutes’ walk from her residence to the workplace was held to have acted unreasonably because of her young age and good health and her application for redundancy compensation was rejected.⁴⁴⁶

⁴⁴⁶ Frosia Hadjigeorgiou v. 1. Lizonic Fashion Center Ltd and 2. Redundancy Fund, 1164/97.

The same principle is applied where the employer introduces new or more advanced technology and requires the employee to accept training and/or adapt to the new methods: if the employee is young, his/her refusal to adapt to the new technology is held unreasonable and therefore redundancy compensation is not paid, whilst if the employee is old, the Court will afford more understanding to his/her inability or refusal to adapt and redundancy compensation is paid.⁴⁴⁷ It is presumed that the same rule would be applied by the Courts in the case of employees with disabilities, although no such case has been brought before the Courts so far, bearing in mind that in cases of employees with disabilities the employer is obliged to provide 'reasonable accommodation' to enable the employee to adapt to the new technology.

No cases have yet been presented before the Courts seeking to reverse the above rules on the basis of the anti-discrimination laws transposing the EU acquis and it is not yet clear whether or not these rules would withstand such a scrutiny.

4.8 Public security, public order, criminal offences, protection of health, protection of the rights and freedoms of others (Article 2(5), Directive 2000/78)

Does national law include any exceptions that seek to rely on Article 2(5) of the Employment Equality Directive?

Article 5(3) (b) of the Cypriot law transposing the Employment Equality Directive⁴⁴⁸ copies the provision in Article 2(5) of the Directive verbatim. The same provision is also to be found in Article 4(2) of Law on Persons with Disabilities (Amendment) of 2004.⁴⁴⁹ There are no other provisions to be found in Cyprus laws relying on the exception set out in Article 2(5) of the Employment Directive.

4.9 Any other exceptions

Please mention any other exceptions to the prohibition of discrimination (on any ground) provided in national law.

The only exceptions to the prohibition of discrimination which are not mentioned above concern the positive action provisions which are discussed below.

5 POSITIVE ACTION (Article 5 Directive 2000/43, Article 7 Directive 2000/78)

- a) What scope does national law provide for taking positive action in respect of racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation? Please refer to any important case law or relevant legal/political discussions on this topic.

Positive action provisions exist in all three laws enacted recently for the purpose of transposing Directives 2000/78 and 2000/43. The provisions are geared towards rendering differential treatment lawful under certain circumstances but fall short from creating an obligation for the adoption of positive action measures or from creating a mandatory regime.

Law N.59(I)/2004, which more or less transposes the Employment Equality Directive, renders non-discriminatory any differential treatment or the introduction or maintaining of special measures which, although indirectly appearing as discriminatory, aim at preventing or compensating for disadvantages linked to ethnic or racial origin.⁴⁵⁰

Along the same lines, Law 58(I)/2004, which more or less transposes the Racial Equality Directive, renders non-discriminatory any preferential treatment in employment which, although prima facie discriminatory, aims at preventing or compensating for disadvantages due to racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, age or sexual orientation.⁴⁵¹

Law 127(I) 2000 on persons with disabilities, as amended by Law N. 57(I)2004, renders non-discriminatory any preferential treatment in occupation which although appearing prima facie discriminatory, aims to prevent or compensate for disadvantages due to disability. The same law provides that the principle of non-discrimination does not prevent the maintaining or introduction of regulations for the protection of health and safety at the workplace or any measures aimed at promoting the inclusion of persons with disabilities in the labour market.⁴⁵²

On 26.09.2002 the Supreme Court of Cyprus had declared void and unconstitutional, a set of legal provisions granting priority to employment in the public sector to persons with disabilities⁴⁵³ and to persons related to the dead and the missing from the 1974 war or with war-related disabilities Law,⁴⁵⁴ on a the basis of a quota system. The Court's reasoning was based on an interpretation of Article 28 of the Constitution that such priority discriminates against other candidates eligible for appointment in the public service. As a result, Law No.245/1987, which had up until then provided priority to qualified candidates with disabilities for appointment in the public education sector, was abolished.

On 16.04.2005 a new law came into force⁴⁵⁵ which restored the old law of 1997⁴⁵⁶ (previously declared unconstitutional by the above decision of the Supreme Court) which gives priority in employment in the public sector to relatives of the dead and the missing from the 1974 war in Cyprus and to persons disabled by the 1974 war. The result was that the quota system was restored only for the relatives of the missing and dead and for persons with war-related disabilities, but not for persons with disability in general, which establishes a prima facie case of discrimination against persons with non-war related disabilities. However, given the fact that there is no mechanism in place to monitor and amend discriminatory legislative provisions, no claim was presented against this law which continues to remain in force.

In a further development, a court decision of 08.12.2006⁴⁵⁷ found Law 87(I)/2004 (granting priority to war-disabled persons) also unconstitutional, on the ground that it introduced a class of beneficiaries (the war-related disabled, etc) that is favoured against others, thus reversing the principle of equality of all applicants before the law and violating Article 28 of the Constitution. Another law⁴⁵⁸ granting pensions to Greek-Cypriots with a disability as a result of their army service or as a result of their involvement in the anti-colonial struggle of 1955-1959 or as a result of the war in 1974, still stands, presumably because it was not challenged in court by anybody. A law granting priority in employment to blind telephonists⁴⁵⁹ had strangely survived the wave of declaring all positive measures unconstitutional; however in 2009 the equality body found this law to be discriminating against persons with other disabilities and has asked for its revision.⁴⁶⁰ At the time of writing, no measures for its revision had been taken.

The above court decisions beg the question whether any law introducing positive action measures will also be deemed as unconstitutional. The government and the parliament were reluctant to introduce quotas in employment for fear that these would be deemed to violate the non-discrimination principle set out in Article 28 of the Constitution, based on the CJEU decision in the Kalanke case.⁴⁶¹ In response to these concerns, in 2006 the Constitution was amended so as to giving priority to EU regulations and Directives over all domestic legislation (including the Constitution). Thus in 2009 a new law was enacted setting quotas in employment in the public sector for persons with disability; it remains to be seen whether this law will also be challenged on the basis of the equality principle and if so what position will the courts take on this issue.

The law of 2004⁴⁶² purporting to transpose the Employment Equality Directive did not introduce the wide scope of Article 7 of the Directive with regard to positive measures.

In particular, the new law did not amend section 5(2) of the 2000 law which merely provides for three types of measures which may be introduced by regulations⁴⁶³ but no such regulations have been introduced so far. The effect of this is that the provision now in force is the old law, which existed prior to the transposition of the Employment Equality Directive and which provides only for the introduction of regulations on three limited types of measures.

b) Do measures for positive action exist in your country? Which are the most important? Please provide a list and short description of the measures adopted, classifying them into broad social policy measures, quotas, or preferential treatment narrowly tailored. Refer to measures taken in respect of all five grounds, and in particular refer to the measures related to disability and any quotas for access of people with disabilities to the labour market, any related to Roma and regarding minority rights-based measures.

Social Policy measures

- The Department of Social Inclusion of Persons with Disabilities under the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance offers several schemes for persons with physical disability. Amongst the schemes offered are the subsidising of disability organisations and the subsidising of holidays for persons with disabilities.
- In 2010 the Ministry of Labour agreed to fund a scheme for social escort services of the Pancyprian Organisation of the Blind for adult persons with visual disability. The scheme involves the hiring of persons for the purpose of escorting blind and blind/deaf persons to various public services (governmental and semi-governmental departments) and other venues such as banks, the post office, hospitals, law offices, shopping, conferences, cultural etc to assist them in the carrying out of personal tasks for which vision is absolutely necessary. Escorts will also read and write the escorted person's personal correspondence, transcribe short texts, letters, articles etc, archive, and copy digital or audio texts or enlarged texts and will buy books, tape, CDs, memory cards and other audiovisual equipment and stationary. The beneficiaries of this service are persons whose vision in their best eye is lower than 6/60 with corrective lenses if such are used, including persons with additional disability (kinetic, mental, psychological).

⁴⁶² Persons with Disabilities Law No. 57(I) 2004, amending the existing Law N.127 (I)/2000.

⁴⁶³ These are: schemes for the employment of persons with disabilities by providing incentives; establishing posts in the public sector exclusively for persons with disabilities; and creation of incentives for employers to employ persons with disability.

The escort services will be managed by the Pancyprian Organisation of the Blind whose officers will assess each request separately and will act depending on the seriousness of each case.⁴⁶⁴

- The Social Welfare Services of the Ministry of Labour offers a grant to persons with “intellectual deprivation” irrespective of the income of his/her family but provided that the person is not in gainful employment and does not own property (immovable or cash). For the year 2009 this grant amounted to €452 monthly. If a person is in gainful employment then the grant is reduced; if the person’s salary exceeds €512 monthly then the grant is discontinued.⁴⁶⁵ In addition to this grant, benefits are offered for: travelling, disposable nappies, monthly benefit for personal comfort, subsidy for heating up to €102 per annum, benefit for special diet as a result of an illness, benefit for assistance outside the home; subsidy for household equipment (furniture, electrical appliances), benefit for clothing and shoes, benefit for special needs which cannot be covered by other ministries (e.g. visual or hearing aids, false teeth, etc), assistance for home improvements, assistance for mental treatments especially for children with “mental deprivation”.
- The Social Insurance Department offers disability pensions and ‘incapacity’ pensions.
- The Disability Welfare Services of the Labour Office has introduced two schemes of providing incentives to employers in the private sector to employ persons with disability, co-funded by the European Social Fund. One scheme targets persons irrespective of the degree of the disability and the other scheme focuses on persons with severe disability (physical, sensory or intellectual).
- The Ministry of Finance offers a monthly benefit to persons with a disability who are in employment and to students and pupils who attend vocational training courses.
- The Ministry of Health offers free medical care in Cyprus for all persons with “intellectual deprivation” who receive disability benefit (i.e. who do not own property and are not in gainful employment).
- The Ministry of Education offers special education to children with “intellectual deprivation”.
- A number of services are offered by the Ministry of Health for persons with mental disorder:
 - Hospital Treatment;
 - Outpatient Clinic Services in all district hospitals, in urban and rural health centres and in community mental health centres;
 - Services at Home (community nursing and occupational therapy programmes);

⁴⁶⁴ Source: Interview with Christakis Nikolaides, president of the Pancyprian Organisation of the Blind dated 28.02.2011.

⁴⁶⁵ This is a highly problematic approach as in practice it results in persons not taking up employment opportunities so as not to lose their state benefit.

- Services for Drug Addiction (on Alcohol, pills or other legal or illegal substances)-offered mainly in the frame of the Nicosia General Hospital (THEMEA) and Limassol General Hospital (THEA) and in the counselling / prevention centres, like "PERSEAS" and "TOXOTIS";
 - Services for Children and Adolescents;
 - Psychosocial Rehabilitation Services offered mainly at Day Centres and at Vocational Rehabilitation Centres.
- By a decision of the Council of Ministers⁴⁶⁶ a scheme of public assistance was created for the housing of single persons or families having a low income with special criteria for persons with disability. Although the measure itself does not make such inference, the class of 'single persons' may include LGBTs.
 - In June 2007 the Council of Ministers decided to modify the stringent Greek language requirement for a certain position in the public service. The decision stated that "very good knowledge of Greek" will no longer be required for employment in the position of medical officer at the Ministry of Health. The decision purports to comply with a recommendation of the equality body pursuant to a complaint for language discrimination against EU and third country nationals. The decision, however, is not extended to cover other positions in the public or private sector, where the requirement of "very good knowledge of Greek" still stands, despite the numerous recommendations against this by the equality body.
 - The Education Ministry provides Turkish language classes for pupils whose mother tongue is Turkish (Turkish-Cypriots, Roma, Kurds etc) in schools where there is high concentration of Turkish speaking pupils. In addition, extra classes of Greek language are offered to pupils whose mother tongue is not Greek (children of migrants, Turkish Cypriots, Roma etc). For the school year 2005-2006, a total of 1,356 hours of extra Greek language classes were offered in schools across Cyprus. For the school year 2007-2008 a total of 1,395 hours of extra Greek language classes will be offered. This measure will involve hiring an additional 48 teachers. The books for teaching Greek to non-native Greek speakers which are being used have been especially designed in and brought from Greece, where they were being used in multicultural schools. Although the impact of this measure has not been evaluated, one of the schools where this measure is in place, namely the Eighteenth Elementary School of Ayios Antonios in Limassol, which is attended by a large number of Turkish speaking pupils, was awarded the Commonwealth Education Good Practice Awards in 2006.⁴⁶⁷
 - The Special Education for young persons with Special Needs Law 1 13(I)/1999, as well as the Public Assistance and Services Law of 1991 guarantees a minimum standard of living for all persons legally residing in Cyprus. The law applies to all persons whose resources do not meet their basic and special needs as defined by law, although no public assistance is paid to migrants who live below the poverty line.

At the same time, this law includes special provisions for persons with a disability, single mothers, older persons, families with four children or more and internally displaced persons.

- Under a law enacted in 2006, the national confederation of organizations of persons with disability KYSOA became a social partner of the state in all matters pertaining to disability. Under the same law, consultation with KYSOA is now obligatory for all governmental departments dealing with disability and KYSOA became a receiver of an annual state grant for its running expenses.⁴⁶⁸ However, this law has not made the automatic upgrading of the status of KYSOA. In the process of consultation which preceded the enactment of the new law on quotas enacted in December 2009, which is clearly the most significant development for the disability movement in years, the objections raised by KYSOA were largely ignored. KYSOA was also excluded from the multi-disciplinary committee that assesses whether an applicant fits the definition of 'person with disability' provided in the law. The fact that KYSOA is not afforded any role whatsoever with regard to the implementation of this law raises questions as regards the essence and significance of the status of a 'social partner'.
- The institution of the 'sheltered workshops' known as KEAA (Centres for Vocational Rehabilitations for the Disabled), explained above in section 2.7 of this report.
- The Protection of the Mentally Retarded Persons Law 117/1989, and the Street and Building (Amendment) Regulations No. 3322 30.4.99 provide for easier and safer access for persons with disabilities to public places and buildings.
- A number of NGOs⁴⁶⁹ offer (state funded) services to persons with intellectual disabilities in the following areas: daily care; after noon care, special treatment; therapy; home in the community (continuous stay); employment in sheltered workshops; supported employment in the open market.
- The Special Fund Law 79(I)/ 1992 provide for services and programmes for the rehabilitation of persons with disability.
- The Law on Persons with Disabilities N.127 (I)/2000, as amended, provides a set of rights for persons with disabilities and implementation measures. These rights include the right to independent living, full access to the community and equality of participation in economic and social life (Article 4(1)). Furthermore, Article 4(2) of the Law provides for: (a) timely detection and diagnosis of the disability (b) personal support with auxiliary equipment (c) access to housing, buildings, streets and generally to the natural environment and to public means of transport (d) access to appropriate education according to their needs; (e) access to information and communication with special means where necessary, especially for certain groups of persons with disabilities of the senses; (f) services for social and economic access to professional assessment and orientation, professional training and employment in the open job market;

⁴⁶⁸ Law on Consultation Process of State and Other Services on Issues concerning Persons with Disability N. 143(I)/2006, dated 3.11.2006.

⁴⁶⁹ In December 2006 there were 28 NGOs offering programs to persons with mental disabilities, according to the record of the Committee for the Protection of the Mentally Deprived.

(g) a dignified standard of living and, where necessary, through financial allowance and social services; (h) the creating of personal and family life; (i) participation in cultural, social, athletic, religious and entertainment activities.” Article 4(2)(a) of the same law provides for the following measures for the creation of employment opportunities: “(i) the introduction of employment schemes for persons with disability by providing incentives for the employers which shall be determined by regulations according to the number of employees or the business cycle of the enterprises concerned; and (ii) the creation of jobs in the governmental, semi-governmental and wider public sector to be fulfilled exclusively by persons with disability”. A number of other rights include “job reinstatement, where possible, of a person with a disability in the same enterprises where the disability occurred during their employment; special protection against dismissal; and the operation of special schemes of employment in the public and private sectors, by providing economic incentives”.⁴⁷⁰ Although it is hard to estimate the impact of these provisions and the extent to which they are being utilised, the potential is nevertheless there. However, bearing in mind the loopholes of the law, it may perhaps be difficult to see how these rights may be translated into social policy.

The issue of accessibility to Courts for persons with disabilities, in the form of physical accessibility, provision of documents in Braille language, sign language interpretations or other is not addressed and it is doubtful if the said legal provisions create any obligations with regard to guaranteeing full accessibility.

Quotas

- A new law enacted in 2009 introduces quotas in the employment of persons with disabilities in the wider public sector at 10 per cent of the number of the vacancies to be filled in at any given time, provided that this does not exceed seven per cent of the aggregate of employees per department. The quota applies to first appointment positions (i.e. excluding promotions) at the introductory scale (i.e. low in hierarchy) and is specifically drafted to exclude areas where special provisions in favour of persons with disability are already in place (more specifically the quota in favour of blind telephonists- see below) and sections of the public service where “all physical, mental or intellectual restrictions must necessarily be absent”⁴⁷¹ (the army, the police, the fire department and the prisons).

- The Appointment of Trained Blind Telephone Operators to the Post of Telephone Operator in the Public Sector (Special Provisions) Law of 1988 (L. 17/1988), Article 3, provides that blind candidates who have all the qualifications required by the scheme of service and who are trained telephone operators⁴⁷² are given priority in appointment. The same law also provides that for the appointment of a non-blind person to the post of telephone operator, the Pancyprian Organisation for the Blind must give its prior written confirmation that there are no blind telephone operators as candidates for the specific post. Article 3 of the same law also provides that in case there are no blind telephone operators as candidates for the said position, other candidates with disability will be preferred. These provisions have worked fairly well and have significantly contributed to the vocational rehabilitation and labour integration of blind persons, as the job of telephone operator continues to be the job of the majority of the blind persons in Cyprus. This law, which has resulted in the employment about 55 blind persons since its enactment in 1988, applies to telephone operators who have completed training at the School for Telephone Operators of the School of the Blind. It is considered by the Pancyprian Organisation of the Blind as a significant positive measure, despite the fact that it refers to a relatively low status type of work that may fall short of utilising the affected persons' full potential. Recent technological developments in telephone services may present a risk for this institution and could mean that training may have to be channelled in other directions.⁴⁷³ Strangely enough, this is the only one that has survived the Courts' tendency to declare unconstitutional laws giving priority in employment to persons with disabilities; however an equality body decision in 2009 has found this law to be discriminatory against persons with other disability and has asked for its revision; no such revision has taken place yet.
- The Public Service Law 1/1990, provides that, in filling vacant posts in the Public Service, priority should be given to disabled candidates who fulfil the schemes of service, provided that the Commission responsible for the selection is satisfied that they are able to perform the duties of the posts and they are not inferior to the rest of the candidates as regards merit and qualifications.

The Public Education Service Law, as amended by Law 180/1987, used to provide that in filling first entry posts in the Public Education Service, persons with disabilities should be appointed in accordance with a proportion specified by Law. Subsequently, this provision was indirectly declared unconstitutional, following a controversial court decision relying on a strict and rather conservative interpretation of the equal treatment principle of the Constitution.⁴⁷⁴

⁴⁷² Training in telephone operation is provided free of charge to all blind persons by the state School for the Blind. Also, the Pancyprian Organisation for the Blind, a non-governmental organisation, offers further training free of charge.

⁴⁷⁴ Republic of Cyprus through the Civil Service Commission v. Eleni Constantinou, Appeal Case No. 3385, 26.09.2002.

This quota provision should have been reinstated following the 2006 amendment to the Constitution by virtue of which the EU regulations and Directives become the supreme law of the country and take precedent over national laws including the Constitution, but so far this did not happen.

Preferential treatment

- Since the partial lifting in the restrictions in the freedom of movement in April 2003, as a result of which several Turkish Cypriots regularly visit the Republic-controlled areas and seek to access health services in public hospitals, the government introduced a policy of providing free medical care to all Turkish-Cypriots without requiring proof of low income, as it is required of Greek Cypriots. This policy derives from another policy followed by the government, according to which certificates issued by the Turkish Cypriot authorities in the north, including income certificates, are not recognised, lest that would amount to recognition of the unrecognised Turkish Cypriot regime in the north. In view of this, it was deemed politically safer to provide free medical care to all Turkish Cypriots independent of income rather than have to review and thus perhaps indirectly extend recognition to income certificates issued in the north. The measure has been rigorously criticised by a section of Greek-Cypriot society, media and politicians who claim that it introduces discrimination against Greek Cypriots.
- Educational Priority Zones (EPZ): This measure, introduced by the Ministry of Education and operating for some years now, aims at placing in a special category certain schools where special attention and particular measures are needed to address certain educational needs, such as pupils coming from particularly poverty-stricken areas, high concentration of non-native Greek speakers, high drop out rate etc. Schools classified as falling within EPZ receive extra teaching hours and other measures where needed. The institution of EPZ aims at reducing inequalities for pupils attending schools in disadvantaged areas with an increased proportion of immigrants, combating school failure and illiteracy. The measure aims at strengthening the capacity of children already attending such schools because of the location of their residence to enable them to stay in school longer and attain better grades.⁴⁷⁵

The following measures are in place in relation to certain groups of persons with disability:

- Exemption from fees for medical purposes in public medical institutions.
- Special parking tickets that secure preferential parking for persons with disability.⁴⁷⁶

⁴⁷⁶ Article 7A of Law on Persons with Disabilities 127(I)/2000 as amended by Law 102(I)/2007.

- Exemption from certain charges concerning telecommunications and telephone services.⁴⁷⁷
- Preferential treatment is offered by semi-governmental organisations to all persons with disability: The Cyprus Telecommunications Authority offers reduced subscriptions for land lines; the Electricity Authority of Cyprus offers reduced electricity rates; and Cyprus Airways (the national air carrier) offers discount at 50 per cent on air tickets to all persons with disability including intellectual disability and their escorts.

Roma and Minority rights based measures

- There are no positive action measures in place for the Roma community or for any other community, except the provisions related to the education of the Turkish-speaking children referred to above (see section 3.2.8), consisting mainly of language classes, plus a small subsidy for school uniforms, the provision of meals at school and transport to and from the school. The aforesaid are not provided to this group in their capacity as Roma but in their capacity as ‘Turkish speaking’ people; no special classes are offered on Roma history and culture. Also, although the institution of the Educational Priority Zone (EPZ) referred to above is intended to cover schools in deprived and impoverished areas, it does not include all the schools attended by Roma pupils residing in neighbouring Roma settlements, which are renowned for their squalor and poverty.
- A few measures are in place regarding the three constitutionally recognised ‘religious groups’: the Armenians, the Maronites and the Latins. The public broadcasting service CyBC (Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation) has for several years been airing radio programmes especially prepared for the Maronites, the Armenians and the Latins, albeit in Greek. There are however some measures in place to promote the use of the languages of the religious groups. As from October 2009, lessons in the Armenian language are being offered to the public by the Ministry of Education in evening classes. The most important measure however was the codification of Cypriot Maronite Arabic. On 9-10 November 2007, the Ministry of Interior and the Ministry of Education held a Symposium for the codification of the Cyprus-Maronite Arabic under the auspices of the Law Commissioner. For the first time in 2007 an alphabet was developed by an expert linguist and specialist in Cypriot Maronite Arabic based on the Latin alphabet and taking into account the specificities of the Cypriot Maronite Arabic language. This was launched by the Maronite community in December 2007. Following the codification, some news articles in Cypriot Maronite Arabic now appear in the Maronite periodicals.⁴⁷⁸ In 2008 a Committee of Experts on Cypriot Maronite Arabic was set up to look into the issue of codification of the Cypriot Maronite Arabic.

⁴⁷⁷ Regulations 311/2001, 382/2002, 473/2002, 525/2002 and a number of decisions of the Cyprus Telecommunications Authority.

⁴⁷⁸ Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages in Cyprus of 23.09.2009.

Then a Cypriot Maronite Arabic revitalisation group was set up, which is composed of the team of experts, representatives of the Cypriot Maronite Arabic-speakers and a representative of the Ministry of Education and Culture who acts as a co-ordinator. In addition, the Council of Ministers has decided to formally set up a team of experts which will be responsible for drafting and implementing an action plan for Cypriot Maronite Arabic.⁴⁷⁹ Other measures include the repair and maintenance of places of worship, cemeteries and schools, small grants for newspapers and other print media published by Maronites, Armenians and Latins and for the creation and upgrade of their websites, the funding of a monument in Larnaca to commemorate the Armenian Genocide, the funding of a documentary for the Latins of Cyprus, etc.

It should however be stated that the three religious groups enjoy a high degree of social integration and amicable relations with the majority population and the administration and their degree of vulnerability cannot be compared to that of the Roma, the Turkish Cypriots or the migrants.⁴⁸⁰

In view of the Cypriot government having recently recognised the Roma as a minority within the meaning of the Framework Convention on the Protection of National Minority, an issue of violation of the equality principle may arise with regard to the measures adopted in respect of the Roma and those adopted in respect of the other minorities. However one may argue that the needs and priorities of the different minority groups are very different and thus the measures must be commensurate with the realities facing each of the minority groups. In the case of the Roma, a housing scheme has been in operation for several years now, which is not available to other minority groups.

⁴⁷⁹ The Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages in Cyprus of 23.09.2009 regrets the fact that the team of experts works without remuneration and the measures for the promotion of the newly codified language have been only partially funded by the government. The report pointed out that for the action plan to be implemented and the work of the team of experts and the revitalisation group to be carried out effectively in the long-run, more financial resources need to be allocated.

⁴⁸⁰ In the case of the Turkish Cypriots, the constitutional crisis of 1963 and the inter-communal violence that ensued, culminating in the war of 1974 has essentially stripped them of their communal rights under the Constitution; in addition, they are facing discrimination and hostility from sections of the majority population. In the case of the Roma, even though they are Cypriot citizens, they live in extreme poverty with a low degree of integration and zero civic participation; however as efforts are being made at the level of education with the Roma children, it is expected that this situation will improve with the new generation of Roma. The migrants of Cyprus have to cope against their precarious and short-term stay in Cyprus in a hostile environment of police repression, discrimination by their employers and harsh treatment by the immigration authorities who will deport migrants after ten or 20 years of stay for reasons like petty crime or simply expiration of their residence visa.

By contrast, the other minority groups (Latins, Maronites, Armenian) have lobbied for and have succeeded in receiving funding and in institutionalising measures adopted in other fields which are not available to the Roma.⁴⁸¹ There is however little justification for the fact that no efforts are made to facilitate the Romas in electing their representative and to afford such representative the same status as that of the representative of the other minority groups. The situation may partly be explained (but not justified) by the fact that these three groups (Latins, Maronites, Armenian) are, broadly speaking, well integrated in Cypriot society and face little or no hostility from the majority community,⁴⁸² whilst the Roma live in squalor, extreme poverty and unemployment, do not speak the majority language (Greek) and face hostility from the majority population.

Some of the most important initiatives of 2010 are:

UN disability Convention and blind women: On 26-28 March 2010 the Cypriot Organisation of the Blind in cooperation with the European Union of the Blind and the working groups of the Union held a conference entitled “Let us make the UN Convention work for women with visual disability”. The conference was financed by the National Machinery for the Rights of Women and the Equality Unit of the Ministry of Justice and was attended by a large number of Cypriot blind women and by over 20 blind women from other EU countries. It aimed at analyzing the provisions of the Convention and at exchanging experiences from the countries that have ratified the Convention or have reliable expert advice on the Convention’s provisions so as to formulate a common framework for developing action and strategies regarding the practical implementation of the Convention. During the deliberations, the national organization of the blind presented a study it has carried out in all countries where there are organisations participation in the European Union of the Blind concerning the ratification of the Convention and the mechanism for monitoring implementation adopted by each country.

Children’s Story for disability discrimination: In the framework of a PROGRESS program the Social Welfare Services of the Ministry of Labour produced a story for children entitled “To Eftapodi” [the Seven-foot] depicting the adventures of a well-qualified octopus with only seven feet trying to secure a job placement.

⁴⁸¹ A few examples of these are: elections are held within the three minority communities to elect their own representative who has the status of an observer in the House of Parliament; the recognition of the Cypriot Maronite Arabic language as a regional or minority language; radio programmes especially prepared for the Maronites, the Armenians and the Latins (some of them in their own language); the funding of newspapers and other print media published by Maronites, Armenians and Latins; funding to create and strengthen their website.

⁴⁸² The only time when the issue of equality between the three religious groups and the Greek Cypriots was raised was when a Greek Cypriot complained to the equality body that the exemption of the adult males of the religious groups from the obligation serve in the army amounted to violation of the equality principle. The equality body found the complaint well founded and recommended that the religious groups be obliged to serve in the army in the same way as Greek Cypriots. The recommendation was adopted by the government.

The story ends up with the seven footed octopus winning a case in Court against the firm that refused to hire him because of his 'disability'. The story book was printed in about 5,000 hard copies and was disseminated at schools and at children's events.⁴⁸³

Observatory of Violence in Schools: During 2010, the Ministry of Education set up an observatory for school violence, using the methodology developed by and in close cooperation with the International Observatory of Violence in Schools and the European Observatory on School Violence. The observatory which is scheduled to commence recording violence at schools in 2011 is mandated to cover all types of violence, including (but not limited to) racist, religiously motivated and homophobic violence. The measure is partly a response to criticisms against schools by the equality body in 2009 for failing to tackle racism at schools.

Revival of the Maronite language: On 05.02.2010 a workshop on the revival of the Maronite language was held, entitled 'The Revival of Cypriot Maronite Arabic: Learning from the Sámi Experience' held in the framework of the Sanna Project on Empowering Children and Youth through Language Revival, organised by the NGO Hki Fi Sanna and its partners to the Sanna Project -PRIO Cyprus Centre, Kormakitis Club & Várdobáiki Sami Centre (<http://sana.squarespace.com>) and supported by a grant from Iceland, Liechtenstein and Norway through the EEA Financial Mechanism, the Norwegian Financial Mechanism and the Republic of Cyprus. Papers offered comparative perspectives on endangered languages and their revival, Sámi Culture, assimilation measures and rights to language, examining prospects amongst teaching the endangered language to pre-schoolers, to school pupils, to adults and to elders.

Anti-discrimination awareness seminar for trade union representatives: On 29.09.2010 the federation of trade unions PEO and the Cypriot Ombudsman co-organised a one-day seminar for trade unionists under the title, "Discrimination at Work: Awareness Campaign for Trade union representatives" which was attended by about 60 trade unionists, Greek-Cypriots and Turkish-Cypriots and funded by the European Commission's PROGRESS program. The course included basic anti-discrimination training, the EU legal framework, grounds of unlawful discrimination, types of discrimination, scope and consequences and the role and responsibilities of trade unionists.

Incentives to employers to hire unemployed vulnerable persons: During 2010 a scheme was launched by the Ministry of Labour aiming to support 'vulnerable groups' to enter the labour market, offering incentives to employers to hire persons from vulnerable groups. The definition of the term includes members of national minorities who require to develop linguistic skills, acquire vocational training or professional experience in order to improve their prospects for access to stable employment, and identified victims of trafficking.

The scheme addresses in general all persons belonging to vulnerable social groups over the age of 15 who are Cypriot or EU nationals or third country citizens who reside legally in the Republic and have the right to work and a permanent residence. The scheme comprises of subsidising employers who will hire unemployed persons from the vulnerable groups and of paying travelling expenses to the persons so hired. The subsidy will be provided only for the first year of employment and will amount to 65 per cent of the annual cost to the employer for the employee in question, with a ceiling of 13,000 Euros per person hired. The scheme applies for the period 19.03.2010-30.06.2014 and is funded jointly by the European Social Fund and the Cypriot government.

Some of the most important initiatives of 2009 include the following:

Ratification of Protocol on Torture: By law 2(III)/2009 the Optional Protocol of the Convention against Torture and other Hard, Inhumane or Humiliating Treatment or Punishment was ratified, appointing the Ombudsman as the national machinery for the prevention of torture. The law authorises the Ombudsman to visit detention centres in order to monitor compliance with the Convention and to submit recommendations on policy and law reform. The Ombudsman's access to detention centres is subject to sending a prior notification of her intended visit. The law also authorises the Ombudsman to refer to the Attorney General any allegations by detainees for human rights violations by police officers; no obligation is cast upon the Attorney General to take any action. The law contains provisions for protection from victimisation of persons supplying information to the Ombudsman as well as prohibition of disclosure of data supplied to the Ombudsman. The law does not specifically provide for an increase in the budget of the Ombudsman to enable her to carry out this additional mandate.

This extension of the Ombudsman's mandate is particularly important given that complaints are often submitted to her office regarding racism and discrimination by prison guards against foreign Turkish Cypriot detainees. In 2009, for instance, the Ombudsman (in her capacity as equality body) received a complaint from a foreign inmate who had been repeatedly beaten up by a guard because he refused, for religious reasons, to remove his turban. Instead of thoroughly investigating this complaint, the prison authorities summoned the complainant to ask him to explain his complaint to them, who felt intimidated and denied having filed a complaint. The equality body regretted the handling of the complaint by the prison authorities which had created a hostile climate, lack of trust and a feeling that the guards' actions will always go unpunished. The new mandate granted by the protocol on torture would enable the equality body to hear the detainees' experiences in person and propose institutional changes to address the problems.

EUROCLIO 16th Annual Professional Training and Development Conference: The 16th Annual Professional Training and Development Conference of EUROCLIO on the theme "Taking the Perspective of the Others: Intercultural Dialogue and Teaching and Learning History" was completed in Cyprus on April 5-11.4.2009.

This initiative was the result of cooperation between EUROCLIO and the Cypriot History Teachers' organizations and Teacher Trade Unions from across the divide, enabling more than 120 participants from 35 different countries within Europe and beyond to engage in a fruitful debate over intercultural dialogue and history teaching and learning.⁴⁸⁴

Educators' Training Course in Human Rights Education: The Directorate of Youth and Sport of the Council of Europe through its Youth Programme on Human Rights Education funded a National Training Course entitled "Educators' Training Course in Human Rights Education: Building Inclusive Environments in Cyprus", organised by the national NGOs Mediterranean Institute for Gender Studies, PRIO Cyprus Centre and the Centre for the Study of Migration, Inter-ethnic and Labour Relations, held between the 06-10.07.2009 at the University of Nicosia. Participants included 22 Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot teachers, youth workers, trainers in non-formal education and youth –related NGO volunteers. The aim was to mainstream Human Rights Education in Cypriot youth policy and work and promote a human rights culture in formal and non-formal education. A number of activities were conducted from COMPASS: A manual on human rights education with young people while various presentations and guest speakers/trainers dealt with issues such as discrimination, xenophobia, gender equality, vulnerability and human rights, refugee and minority rights, children's rights, poverty etc.

Ceremony honouring heroes who saved members of the 'others' community during intercommunal conflicts of the 50s, 60s and 70s: The ceremony to honour ten heroes for their acts of courage and humanity in times of war was organised by 14 Greek-Cypriot and Turkish-Cypriot NGOs. These were people who, during the intercommunal conflicts of the 50s and 60s and the Turkish invasion of 1974, risked their lives to save and protect members of the 'other side', their supposed enemies, at immense personal risk. Commemorative plaques and olive branches were presented to the men, in some cases by those whom they had saved. In an emotional celebration, their stories were heard through firsthand accounts or through the testimony of their families.⁴⁸⁵

Diversity Day 03.10.2009: Part of the "For Diversity. Against Discrimination" campaign, this event, organised by the EC representation in Cyprus and funded through PROGRESS, targeted employers via the media, employees and young persons (16-24).

⁴⁸⁵ The event is available on YouTube: <http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9OBQu-kAXbY&feature=related>

The program of the event included a press conference; an opening by the EU Commissioner for Health, with the participation of the Ministers of Employment and Justice, the ombudsman and the head of the EC delegation to Cyprus; a workshop on equal treatment between men and women and an open discussion from trade unions and employers organizations; various diversity training games focusing on human rights for children aged seven to 13, parents, teachers from the Compasito program of the council of Europe (organised by the NGO Support centre); children's story readings; the screening of two documentaries on diversity produced by Cypriot film makers and the EC; graffiti art; music and a live link with DeeJay radio; an 'Ability Park'; and various information stands from governmental and non - governmental institutions handing out material to passers by.

Living Library: In the framework of the Diversity Day (above) the initiative of the Living Library was held in Nicosia. on 03.10.2009 Limassol and On the 29.09.2009 the innovative method of the 'Living Library' designed promote dialogue, reduce prejudices and encourage understanding, operated in Cyprus, at Intercollege Limassol, where 10 living books and 100 readings took place, organised by Youth for Exchange and Understanding in cooperation with Intercollege Limassol. Visitors to the Living Library were given the opportunity to speak informally with "people on loan"; this latter group was extremely varied in age, sex and cultural background. The second 'Living Library' took place in Nicosia and was organised under the auspices of the EC Delegation. There were 15 living books and over one hundred readings as part of the Diversity Day referred to above.⁴⁸⁶

Information leaflet on the provisions of law transposing The Employment Equality Directive: The Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance has produced a leaflet which explains in simple terms the provisions of Law on Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation N.58(I)/2004, published in Greek, English, Turkish and Russian. The publication targets youth (children, young people, students), women, the elderly, ethnic minorities, national minorities and migrants.

Muslim Bayram Holidays: On 14.09.2009 the prestigious Nicosia-based semi-public English School, the only school in Nicosia hosting both Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot students, announced its decision to adopt the Muslim Bayram Holidays of 21st September and 27th November as official school holidays in order to foster a climate of mutual respect and inclusiveness at the school. In Spring 2010, however, the Parliamentary Finance Committee decided to block the approval of the €320,000 state subsidy earmarked for the school over allegations of school board mismanagement, allegedly manifested in the school's decision to adopt the Turkish Bayram as a school holiday and in teachers travelling abroad three years ago to attend an ethnic reconciliation seminar in Ireland.

⁴⁸⁶ <http://picasaweb.google.co.uk/LivingLibrary.org/LivingLibraryLimassolCyprus#>

The school has been at the centre of political debates since 2003 when it opened again its doors to Turkish Cypriot pupils after 30 years (now forming 13 per cent of the school's student population). In 2006 the school received considerable publicity when a group of hooded youth entered the school and physically attacked the school's Turkish Cypriot students.

Some of the most important initiatives which took place in 2008 include the following:

Racism in sports: On 11.07.2008 a new law came into force⁴⁸⁷ (addressing violence in sporting venues in general. The law includes a provision (article 71) prohibiting statements by sports actors amounting to encouragement of violence and of feelings of prejudice, racism or discrimination against inter alia other spectators or sports fans, sports actors, journalists, players or referees; such statements are punishable with a fine not exceeding Euros 5,000. A further provision of the same law (article 72) outlaws the use of posters or banners with racist or insulting content, gestures or the uttering of words with racist or insulting content, the penalty for which is imprisonment not exceeding six months and/or a fine not exceeding Euros 1,000.

Educational reform: The school year 2008-2009 has been described as the "Year of Educational Reform". A proposal for comprehensive educational reform pending for several years has finally begun to be tackled. The Ministry of Education has appointed a commission to revise the curricula and textbooks that contain elements that stand in the way of reconciliation between Greek-Cypriots and Turkish-Cypriots and to foster a spirit of tolerance and cooperation. In a statement to the press, the Education Minister Andreas Demetriou referred to the "target of developing a spirit of reconciliation within the schools with the Turkish Cypriots, so that this reconciliation occurs within the consciousness of all the citizens of Cyprus regardless of community." This will involve revision of the textbooks on the history of Cyprus in the last 50 years, which is expected to be implemented within little more than a year. The Minister stated that it was "very important that we have an informed youth that understands that different communities live in Cyprus".

Anti-discrimination campaign: Between December 2007 and December 2008 the Welfare Services of the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance organised a number of activities under the general title National Awareness Activities in the fields of Antidiscrimination, Diversity and Equality – "DIALOGUES", funded at 80% by the European Commission in the framework of the European Year of Equal Opportunities 2007.⁴⁸⁸ The activities focused on public awareness on combating discrimination on the basis of Directives 2000/43/EC and 2000/78EC, promoting diversity, equal opportunities, with emphasis on vulnerable groups.

⁴⁸⁷ Law on Prevention and Combating of Violence in Sports Venues N. 48(I)/2008 (11.07.2008).

⁴⁸⁸ The remaining 20% was provided by the Cypriot government.

The activities consisted of: seminars and discussions in different towns including rural areas, culminating to a major conference on 21.11.2008 in Nicosia; distribution of leaflets on the world day of combating discrimination (21.03.08) and on Europe Day (09.05.2008); and a competition of a children's book on discrimination.

PROGRESS awareness raising activities: The Cyprus Labour Institute (INEK-PEO) organised a series of seminars under the general title 'Awareness Raising Activities in Cyprus against Discrimination on Ground of Race, Ethnicity, Religion and Age', funded by the European Commission under PROGRESS (The Community Programme for Employment and Social Solidarity).⁴⁸⁹ The first activity was an international Conference titled 'European legislation and policy against discrimination on the ground of race, ethnicity and religion: theory, practice and future challenges' on 28.02.2008 which targeted governmental and non-governmental organisations as well as members of the legislature and speakers included the President of the Republic, the Ombudsman, NGO representatives and officials from key governmental departments.

A number of seminars targeting Cypriot and migrant workers, Turkish-Cypriots and a seminar on Roma were held throughout the year, including capacity building for NGOs and young workers to face discrimination, the rights of migrant workers (in Romanian and Bulgarian), the EU anti-discrimination acquis in Greek and in Turkish, etc.

Diversity management training: On 04.04.2008 a diversity management training seminar was co-organised by NGO Symfiliosi and the national employers' association OEV (Industrialists and Employers' Federation), as part of a project managed by the Migration Policy Group and Human European Consultancy, in the framework of the European Year of Equal Opportunities for All. The training was attended by approximately 40 Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot representatives of trade unions, employers and public authorities. There was simultaneous language interpretation between Greek-Turkish.

Anti-discrimination training: On 5-6.04.2008 Symfiliosi organised a two-day anti-discrimination follow-up seminar targeting NGO activists and trade unionists who had attended one of the previous anti-discrimination seminars held in 2005 and 2007, as part of a project managed by the Migration Policy Group and Human European Consultancies.

INTI conference: On 28.02.2008 the Mediterranean Institute of Gender Studies in collaboration with the University of Nicosia organised an international conference within the framework of the transnational project entitled "Integration of Female Migrant Domestic Workers: Strategies for Employment and Civic Participation" funded under the INTI Preparatory Actions 2005 Programme, by the European Commission.

⁴⁸⁹ For some information on the subject, although by no means complete see http://www.inek.org.cy/english/index.php?article_id=62&subject=standalone&parent_id=0

This project was implemented in partnership with LAI-MOMO (Italy), ISIS- Institute for Social Infrastructure (Germany), ANTIGONE - Information & Documentation Centre on Racism, Ecology, Peace and Non Violence (Greece), CREA (Centre of Research in Theories and Practices that Overcome Inequalities) University of Barcelona (Spain) and The Filipino National Workers Association (Cyprus). The conference included presentations by academics, both Cypriot and European, as well as by activists and female migrant workers on issues of civic participation, employment, representation and other integration related issues.⁴⁹⁰

ERF vocational training program: As from September 2008 Intercollege, Cyprus' largest tertiary education establishment, is running a free vocational training program for recognized refugees or persons with subsidiary protection aged 18 and above throughout Cyprus, in the framework of the European Refugee Fund. The training courses include classes on business administration and computers and selection will be based on maintaining a balance between male and female participants, as well as, country of origin, and status of protection, with the aim of increasing employability of this vulnerable group.

6 REMEDIES AND ENFORCEMENT

6.1 Judicial and/or administrative procedures (Article 7 Directive 2000/43, Article 9 Directive 2000/78)

In relation to each of the following questions please note whether there are different procedures for employment in the private and public sectors.

In relation to the procedures described, please indicate any costs or other barriers litigants will face (e.g. necessity to instruct a lawyer?) and any other factors that may act as deterrents to seeking redress (e.g. strict time limits, complex procedures, location of court or other relevant body).

Are there available statistics on the number of cases related to discrimination brought to justice? If so, please provide recent data.

- a) What procedures exist for enforcing the principle of equal treatment (judicial/administrative/alternative dispute resolution such as mediation)?

The procedures for the enforcement of the principle of equal treatment are of three types:

The Equality Body: Via the 'extra-judicial' process⁴⁹¹ before the Equality Body whereby individuals and organisations may submit complaints which the equality body has a duty to investigate and issue decisions or recommendations.⁴⁹² Complaints may be submitted by natural or legal persons alleging discrimination on any of the prohibited grounds (EU Directives, Protocol 12 to the ECHR, the Cyprus Constitution) in any of the fields within the scope of the laws. The equality body is empowered to issue binding decisions and/or make recommendations and impose small fines. The equality body also has a duty to monitor the enforcement of the orders it issues,⁴⁹³ which are published in the Official Gazette.⁴⁹⁴ The Equality Body is further empowered to impose fines, for failure to comply with its recommendations,⁴⁹⁵ which are however so low that they can hardly be seen as a deterrent. For this reason, it nearly always chooses to mediate or issue recommendations and has never so far imposed a fine, apart from once in a gender discrimination case. The decisions of the equality body may only be challenged in Court by way of judicial review of administrative action at the Supreme Court under article 146 of the Cyprus Constitution.⁴⁹⁶

⁴⁹¹ In Greek, «Εξώδικη διαδικασία» as per Section 9Γ(1) of Law No. 57(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004); Section 9, Law No. 59(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004); Section 13, Law No. 58(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004).

⁴⁹³ Section 24(1), Law No. 42(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004).

⁴⁹⁴ Section 15, Law No. 42(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004).

⁴⁹⁵ Section 26(1), Law No. 42(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004). The Equality body may impose a fine up to 350 Cyprus pound (600 euro) for failure to comply with recommendation under Section 25 [Section 26(1)(a)] and/or up to 50 Cyprus pound (about 85 euro) per day for continuing failure to comply after the expiry of the deadline set for compliance of the recommendation.

⁴⁹⁶ Section 23, Law No. 52(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004).

If after investigation the equality body finds that a certain law or regulation contravenes the anti-discrimination laws, the equality body will refer the discriminatory law or regulation to the Attorney General in order to draft an amendment.

Whilst the Equality Body's powers and mandate are exactly the same for claims against the public and the private sector, it receives very few complaints against the private sector. This is attributed by the officers of the Equality Body to the fact that the public is largely unaware of the existence and the powers of the Equality Body, often confusing it with the institution of the Ombudsman (whose competencies are restricted to the public sector), which has so far overshadowed the Equality Body.

There are no time bars or other restrictions in applying to the Equality Body which is a rather flexible, informal and user friendly procedure (although a time bar of 12 months applies for submitting complaints to the Ombudsman).⁴⁹⁷

The judicial process:

- Labour law and issues relating to employment matters are dealt with by the Labour Tribunal.⁴⁹⁸ The Labour Tribunal consists of three persons: a judge, who chairs the hearing and two wing members, who come from the side of the trade unions and the employers' organisations. The procedure in the tribunal is similar to a district court, but less formal. However, the labour tribunal decision of 2008 in the case of *Hadjiavraam*⁴⁹⁹ rejected a claim for discrimination in the hiring procedure and found that it has no jurisdiction to try cases where no employment relationship exists. The legal vacuum which resulted from this decision was remedied in 2009 by an amendment of the law on Equal Treatment and Employment and Occupation (N.58(I)/2004) which transposes the Employment Equality Directive minus the disability component of the Directive to the effect that all disputes arising under this law must be deemed as labour disputes. The disability law was not amended in the same manner as a result of which the legal gap created by the Hadjiavraam case remains in the case of disability: persons with disability have no competent Court to apply to for employment related claims where no employment relationship exists.
- Criminal law procedures are available in relation to discrimination related offences under the Penal Code. These procedures must be instigated by the police, although there is also in some cases the possibility of conducting a private criminal law case.
- Law 59(I)/2004 (more or less transposing the Racial Equality Directive) provides in article 8(1) for resort to the District Court, for violation of the law's provisions.

⁴⁹⁷ Law amending and unifying the Laws on the Commissioner for Administration N. 3/91 as amended, Article 5(1)(a).

⁴⁹⁸ For any of the employment directive grounds Section 12(1), Law N. 58(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004) and for disability discrimination and Section 9B(1) of Law No. 57(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004).

⁴⁹⁹ Avgoustina Hajjivraam v. The Cooperative Credit Company of Morphou, 30.07.2008, Case No. 258/05, reported above.

- Rights guaranteed by the Constitution, such as the anti-discrimination provision of article 28, are according to legal precedent⁵⁰⁰ actionable in Court per se against, inter alia, individuals.
- All administrative acts can be challenged before the Supreme Court, via Article 146 of the Constitution.⁵⁰¹ Persons alleging discriminatory behaviour from public authorities may, under Article 146 of the Cyprus Constitution,⁵⁰² apply to the Supreme Court to set aside the act complained of. In practice, this is the procedure most often used by complainants, presumably because it is the one that most lawyers are familiar with. The person in whose favour a decision under 146 has been made may institute legal proceedings in a court for the recovery of damages or for being granted other remedy and to recover just and equitable damages to be assessed by the court.

There are a number of restrictions in place as regards the judicial process: time bars;⁵⁰³ high fees and legal aid restrictions; security for costs; language barriers including issues relating to accessibility for persons with disabilities (e.g. blind, deaf and other persons); the issue of locus standi or legitimate interest; the immunity enjoyed by certain individuals under the Constitution such as elected and appointed state officers, diplomats, lawyers on issues relating to the conduct of cases they handle, etc; and various country-specific structural problems that in practice undermine the right of access (such as the doctrine of necessity analysed earlier in this report).

The inspectorate process: The Minister of Labour is empowered to appoint Inspectors for the purpose of the better implementation of the law in terms of addressing employment discrimination issues.⁵⁰⁴

⁵⁰⁰ Yiallourou v. Evgenios Nicolaou (2001), Supreme court case, Appeal No. 9331, 08.05.2001.

⁵⁰¹ Section 12(1), Law No. 58(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004); Section 19 of Law No. 57(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004) and Section 9B(1) of Law No. 57(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004).

⁵⁰² The right to recourse to Article 146 of the Cyprus Constitution is restricted to governmental administrative acts

⁵⁰³ Since 1964, save for any agreement entered by the parties, there are no statutory limitations to actions: the Cyprus/Law on suspension of Limitations of actions 57/1964 suspended all time bars in respect of actions instituted on or after 21.12.1963. Nevertheless, there are procedural time limits that restrict actions allowed by litigants, for instance the time limits for lodging an appeal are strictly adhered to: 42 days from the date of the judgement for an appeal from the final determination; 14 for interlocutory injunctions; 75 days for an application to set aside an administrative decision under Article 146 of the Constitution, referred to above.

⁵⁰⁴ Section 19 of Law No. 57(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004).

However, this process is yet to be implemented, as the regulations regarding the powers vested in the Chief inspector and inspectors⁵⁰⁵ are yet to be issued. It would seem reasonable to assume that the Labour Relations Department of the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance would be the department in charge of implementing this provision,⁵⁰⁶ given also that this department's mandate includes the setting up of enforcement mechanisms (Inspectors, Research and Evaluation Committee etc) only in relation to gender equality.⁵⁰⁷ Nevertheless, the department responsible for Laws N. 57(I)/2004 and 58(I)/2004 is the Department of Labour of the Ministry of Labour. The Minister has not yet utilised his powers to appoint any inspectors.

By far the cheapest and most effective procedure is the complaint to the Equality body. All court actions entail costs and other necessities such as the need to instruct a lawyer if one is to have any chance to succeed against a generally speaking more powerful institution or employer, who are likely to be legally represented. There are also other deterrents in seeking redress in Court, such as strict time limits and complex procedures, the fact that legal procedures are generally slow, the difficulty in securing witnesses willing to testify. Even the procedure before the Labour tribunals, originally designed to be informal and easy and accessible to ordinary working people is lengthy, complex and costly, although to a lesser extent than the normal courts are. The Equality body will accept complaints submitted to it in English; however its website is only in Greek, with the Turkish and English version "under construction". On its website, the electronic complaints submission form can be found in English but not in Turkish, which is an official language of the Republic. The Court will require all documents to be in Greek, although during the hearing an interpreter will be provided by the Court. However, in a recent case before the Supreme Court, the court accepted the pleadings submitted by the Turkish Cypriot applicants in the Turkish language and instructed the Attorney General to serve pleadings to the applicants in Turkish.

Accessibility to buildings is also an issue to consider: the new premises of the Equality body's office are accessible by wheelchair but many of the Court buildings are not accessible to persons with disabilities and the legal documents are not made available by the Court in Braille language.

The same rules apply in both the private and the public sector. The Ombudsman, in his/her capacity as such, will investigate complaints of maladministration and discrimination from public bodies/state organs towards individuals; in his/her capacity as the national Equality body, s/he will investigate complaints in both the private as well as the public sector.

⁵⁰⁵ Section 19(2) of Law No. 57(I) of 2004 (31.03.2004).

⁵⁰⁶ This derived from (a) the fact it is an employment matter, (b) a reading of the text of law 58(I)/2004 provides that the Minister in charge is the Minister of Labour and Social Insurance [see article 2 of the law]; moreover the inspectorate 'aiming at better implementation of the provisions of the said law' is appointed by the same Minister, who also responsible for submitting a report on the implementation of the said law.

⁵⁰⁷ Letter from the Ministry of Labour to the national expert, dated 20.01.2006.

No record is kept as to how many discrimination cases are brought before the Courts. In fact there is no publicly accessible database listing District Court decisions at all. In the case of Supreme Court decisions, these can be made available from a private database upon paying a subscription; in this database, cases are not grouped per subject but can be searched through a keyword. Only the equality body publishes annually data regarding the number of complaints received, the ground complained of, the outcome etc. The ombudsman's office also publishes statistics about complaints received and investigated but it is not always clear from the data which of these complaints concern discrimination and which concern maladministration.

It should be noted that the inadequate provision of legal aid,⁵⁰⁸ the low awareness of the anti-discrimination laws among legal circles and the length of time required for litigation to be completed, renders the use of the judicial process very rare: So far only one case was tried alleging violation of the law transposing the anti-discrimination acquis.⁵⁰⁹

b) Are these binding or non-binding?

The judicial as well as the inspectorate process lead to binding decisions.

The equality body has the power to issue legally binding decisions. However, in practice the decisions issued are usually mere recommendations because, in the opinion of the equality body, better results can be achieved through mediation. Such recommendations, although not legally binding, tend to be complied with at least by individuals. In some cases the equality body is vested with the power to impose fines⁵¹⁰ but this power has not been used yet for cases under the anti-discrimination Directives. The equality body's decisions are generally regarded by both the authorities and the public as valid and credible and often as an indication of what the likely outcome would be, had the case been presented before the courts, even though the equality body's mandate is wider than that of the court and tends to stumble less on technicalities than what courts do.

The Ombudsman does not have the power to issue binding decisions, even though its decisions are generally authoritative and to a large extent complied with.

⁵⁰⁸ The Law on Provision of Legal Aid (2002) N. 165(I)/2002 provides for legal aid only for criminal and civil law cases: administrative recourses are excluded, although a recent ECtHR decision found that "a question arises as to the conformity of such legislation with the requirements of Article 6 of the Convention" and that "there is a priori no reason why it should not be made available in spheres other than criminal law" (Marangos v. Cyprus, Application no. 12846/05, dated 04.12.2008). The legal aid law extends to human rights violations covered by the Constitution and by a number of international conventions including the Convention for the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination, but not to the laws transposing the two anti-discrimination Directives.

⁵⁰⁹ Avgoustina Hajiavraam v. The Cooperative Credit Company of Morphou (2008)

⁵¹⁰ Elaborated in Section 6.5 here in below.

In November 2008 the ombudsman stated that the government had complied with 80 percent of her office's recommendations.⁵¹¹

c) What is the time limit within which a procedure must be initiated?

Since 1964, save for any agreement entered by the parties,⁵¹² there are no statutory limitations to actions: the Law on suspension of Limitations of actions N.57/1964 suspended all time bars in respect of actions instituted on or after 21.12.1963.⁵¹³ Nevertheless, there are procedural time limits that restrict actions allowed by litigants, for instance the time limits for lodging an appeal are strictly adhered to: 42 days from the date of the judgement for an appeal from the final determination, 14 for interlocutory injunctions and 75 days for filing a recourse against an administrative act under article 146 of the Constitution.

d) Can a person bring a case after the employment relationship has ended?

There is no express provision on this point in the new anti-discrimination laws. However, the Laws on the Commissioner for Administration 1991-2004⁵¹⁴ which sets out the mandate of the Ombudsman (note: not the mandate of the equality body) state that the complaint must be submitted to the ombudsman's office within twelve months from the date on which the complainant received notice of the activities or omissions for which he/she is applying to the ombudsman.⁵¹⁵ The 2004 amendment of this law provides for a new mandate, duties and powers bestowed upon the Ombudsman by virtue of any law, on matters relating to gender equality, equality and enjoyment of human rights and freedoms irrespective of race, ethnic origin, community, language, colour, religion, political or other belief, special needs, age and sexual orientation.⁵¹⁶ Whether the employment relationship has ended or not at the time of submitting the complaint is immaterial, although the equality body, in the process of investigating a complaint, will take into account the surrounding circumstances of each case and whether the complainant has acted reasonably in respect of the timing of lodging his/her complaint.⁵¹⁷ The Court on the other hand is less likely to take the liberal approach adopted by the equality body and more likely to adopt a conservative approach; this was the case in the decision of the labour tribunal in the case of Hadjiavraam.

6.2 Legal standing and associations (Article 7(2) Directive 2000/43, Article 9(2) Directive 2000/78)

Please list the ways in which associations may engage in judicial or other procedures

- a) What types of entities are entitled under national law to act on behalf or in support of victims of discrimination? (please note that these may be any association).

The laws purporting to transpose the anti-discrimination acquis do not go into any lengths to describe the type of entities that may act on behalf or in support of victims; they merely provide that organisations with a legitimate interest and with the victim's permission can represent a victim of discrimination in proceedings both before the Equality Body as well as before the Court. It is presumed that such organisations must at the very least be registered, or else they lack legal personality and legal capacity. The presumption is reinforced by the fact that Law 59(I)/2004 (roughly transposing the Racial Equality Directive), article 12, requires that in order for organisations or other legal persons to be able to represent and act on behalf of persons in applying to the courts or the equality body, such organisations must (in addition to the victim's permission) have a provision in their memorandum and articles of association that the elimination of discrimination on the ground of racial or ethnic origin is part of their aims. The equality body may investigate cases following applications by NGOs, chambers, organisations, committees, associations, clubs, foundations, trade unions, funds and councils acting for the benefit of professions or other types of labour, employers, employees or any other organised group, local authorities, public law persons, the Council of Ministers, the House of Parliament etc.⁵¹⁸ In practice, however, associations have made little use of this opportunity so far, with only a handful of human rights organisations filing complaints to the Equality Body on behalf of victims which they formally or informally represent. The equality body follows a flexible approach and does not demand to see members' permissions or copies of articles of association in order to ensure that the law's requirements are met before investigation begins.

- b) What are the respective terms and conditions under national law for associations to engage in proceedings on behalf and in support of complainants? Please explain any difference in the way those two types of standing (on behalf/in support) are governed. In particular, is it necessary for these associations to be incorporated/registered? Are there any specific chartered aims an entity needs to have; are there any membership or permanency requirements (a set number of members or years of existence), or any other requirement (please specify)? If the law requires entities to prove "legitimate interest", what types of proof are needed? Are there legal presumptions of "legitimate interest"?

⁵¹⁸ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/2004 (19.03.2004), Section 34(2).

In the case of Law 58(I)/2004 (roughly transposing the Employment Equality Directive) article 14 provides that workers' organisations or other organisations with a legitimate interest can act on behalf of their members with the members' permission in claiming their right to resort to the Courts or to the equality body. Similarly, article 9D of the disability Law N. 127(I)/2007 as amended by Law 57(I)/2004, provides that workers' organisations or other organisations with a legitimate interest can, with their members' permission, exercise on their behalf the right to recourse to the courts or to the equality body. No other 'legitimate interest' is required under this law. For actions on the ground of race/ethnic origin, as stated under paragraph (a) above, the law roughly transposing the Racial Equality Directive (59(I)/2004), article 12, requires that organisations must have both the victim's permission and a provision in their memorandum and articles of association that the elimination of discrimination on the ground of racial or ethnic origin is part of their aims. No distinction is made between the two types of standing (on behalf/in support). As indicated in paragraph (a) above, it is necessary for these organisations to be registered in order to bring an action, at least in Court; the Equality Body is more flexible on the structure of the entity filing the complaint. In order to be able to file a case of discrimination on the ground of race/ethnic origin, the organisation's memorandum and articles must include the combating of discrimination in its stated aims.

There are no membership or permanency or other requirements in the law. No case involving an organisation acting in support of or on behalf of a victim has ever been presented in Court, so it is hard to say how the Court will interpret the term 'organisation' and whether any required features will be attached to the concept. The Equality Body which has examined a number of complaints from organisations does not impose any restrictions and has no requirements; for instance it has investigated complaints from organisations acting on behalf of a group of persons, which do not have to be named specifically (e.g. 'asylum seekers', 'children with disabilities' etc). However, this liberal approach is not indicative of the stand which the Courts are likely to take.

With regard to legitimate interest, again the Equality Body raises no such issues but the Courts do in a substantive way. In two cases presented earlier in this report, the Court rejected the applicants' claim for, inter alia, lack of legitimate interest: in one case the claim concerned an athletic award for disabled athletes which was lower than that of other athletes, where the claimant had not at the time of filing the application become entitled to it;⁵¹⁹ and in the other case the applicant was deemed to lack a legitimate interest since there was no positive legislative provision entitling her to claim the right of extending a regulation on the age of retirement so as to include her age group.⁵²⁰

⁵¹⁹ Antonis Aresti v. Cyprus Athletics Organisation (Supreme Court Case No. 1406/2008 dated 10.02.2010).

⁵²⁰ Eleni Kyriakidou v Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation (Supreme Court case no. 18/2008, dated 03.12.2010).

Along the same line of thinking, in an older case⁵²¹ alleging violation of the non-discrimination principle of Article 28 of the Constitution on the grounds of belief deriving from the fact that he is a homosexual, the respondent argued, by way of a preliminary objection, that the applicant lacked legitimate interest that would enable him to file the present recourse, as his failure to discharge his military obligations meant that he did not possess the required qualifications for the post. The Court sustained the respondent's preliminary objection and rejected the applicant's recourse. This case is by no means unique. Cases involving claimants who are purported to belong to certain categories or are ascribed certain characteristics seem to be particularly vulnerable to having their access blocked; such a category are Turkish-Cypriots claiming their properties located in the Republic-controlled areas against the institution of the "Custodian" of Turkish Cypriot Properties, which is the Interior Minister. In *Mehmet Ahmet v. the Republic of Cyprus*⁵²² concerning the administration of an estate belonging to a deceased Turkish-Cypriot, the Custodian of Turkish-Cypriot Properties objected⁵²³ to a request to sell and divide the proceeds of the sale to the heirs.⁵²⁴ Counsel for the plaintiff argued that the Custodian had no locus standi and that Law 139/1991 providing for the administration of Turkish Cypriot properties by the 'Custodian' is incompatible with the EC law. The trial Court refused the claim and also ruled that section 33 of Law 139/1991 does not apply to cases where the administrator of an estate is empowered to proceed with the allocation of the property but is unable to do so as a result of an estoppel. An appeal to the Supreme Court for permit to submit a preliminary question to the CJEU about the legality of the Custodian law was dismissed. The Supreme Court rejected the argument on locus standi and secondly, it noted that is the appellant did not appeal against the trial Court findings on the provisions of section 33, therefore whatever the ruling of the CJEU, the trial Court decision would still stand.

In general, individuals who have been personally aggrieved, have a legitimate interest in Cypriot administrative law to engage in proceedings. Under Article 146(2) of the Constitution: "such recourse may be made by a person whose existing legitimate interest, which he has either as a person, or by virtue of being a member of a community, is adversely and directly affected by such decision or omission". Since 1999 the common law provisions have been codified into a single law that summarises the existing practice (Law 158(I)/99).

The interpretation of Article 146(2) of the Constitution by the Supreme Court has restricted the right of recourse to physical and legal persons who have been adversely and directly affected and have a legitimate interest.

⁵²¹ Stavros Marangou v. The Republic of Cyprus through the Public Service Commission (17.07.2002, Case no. 311/2001). The applicant applied to the Court seeking the annulment of the decision of the Public Service Commission to reject his job application for a post at the Ministry of Interior because of his failure to serve in the army, pursuant to article 31(b) of the Public Service Law.

⁵²² Cyprus/ Civil Case no. 277/2006 (13.01.2009).

⁵²³ Based on sections 33, 53, 55 and 58 of the Law on Administration of Estates, Cap. 189, the relevant Regulations and sections 2, 3, 5, 6(α) and 6(γ) of the Law on Turkish-Cypriot Properties (Administration and Other Subjects) (Temporary Provisions) 139/1991.

⁵²⁴ Based on sections 31, 32, 33, 51 και 53(1)(σ) of the Law on Administration of Estates, Cap. 189.

Representatives were not considered to have legitimate interest⁵²⁵ and the term “community” is defined as meaning the Greek and Turkish communities, as defined in Article 2 of the constitution.⁵²⁶ The original test for an association to possess an “existing legitimate interest” was hard to satisfy, as it required that the specific administrative act ‘directly affects’ the whole or part of the membership, whereas if it only affects one member or if there are conflicting interests between members then the association has no legitimate interest.⁵²⁷

- c) Where entities act on behalf or in support of victims, what form of authorization by a victim do they need? Are there any special provisions on victim consent in cases, where obtaining formal authorization is problematic, e.g. of minors or of persons under guardianship?

The law does not specify any particular form of authorisation. The equality body has never requested any organisation submitting a complaint on behalf of a victim to present such an authorisation. As no such case has been brought before the Courts, it is difficult to predict what conditions the Courts will decide to attach to this requirement and how case law will evolve on this issue. There are no special provisions on victim consent where obtaining a formal authorisation is problematic. Generally speaking, children victims do not have any special status or enjoy any special rights in Court and they cannot participate in the judicial proceedings in any manner other than by testifying as witnesses. Given that the Courts in Cyprus have no hesitation in reading ‘consent’ in a minor’s behaviour when it comes to sexual abuse⁵²⁸ then strictly speaking they should put no obstacles in the way of an organisation obtaining consent from a minor in order to bring an action in Court.

- d) Is action by all associations discretionary or some have legal duty to act under certain circumstances? Please describe.

There is no duty imposed by the laws transposing the anti-discrimination Directives or any other laws, bestowed upon any organisation to undertake action; this is purely a discretionary right.

⁵²⁶ Osman Saffet v. the Cyprus Palestine Plantations Co. Ltd and another 4 RSCC p.87, p.89.

⁵²⁷ The Police Association v. The Republic.

⁵²⁸ In the case of Kyriakos Kailis v. the Republic (Criminal Appeal No. 7490, dated 21.04. 2004) the Appeal Court quashed the perpetrator’s sentence on the ground that the minor’s lack of consent had not been proven. No attention was paid to the fact that immediately after the event the victim was seen by her friends and her mother in a very distressed condition (bleeding, looking upset, unable to walk, with dusty and muddy clothes). According to the judge, the victim was upset not because she was raped but because she had consensual sex with the perpetrator and subsequently regretted losing her virginity. In the case of Christodoulos Armeftis v. the Republic (Criminal Appeal No. 56/06, dated 13.03.2008) the Appeal Court reduced the appellant’s sentence for rape from ten years to five years on the ground that lack of consent had not been proven (the appellant’s sexual abuse of the victim, who was his stepdaughter, started when the latter was 7 years old and lasted until she was 11). In the case of Savvas Evangelou v. the Republic (Criminal Appeal No. 152/2007, 09.06.2008) the perpetrator’s conviction was quashed because the victim (who was 11 at the time) did not physically resist the assault and because when she became 14 the victim entered into a relationship and had sexual relations with her boyfriend.

One cannot altogether exclude the possibility that such an obligation may exist in any internal regulations of an organisation but this would be the exception rather than the rule.

- e) What types of proceedings (civil, administrative, criminal, etc.) may associations engage in? If there are any differences in associations' standing in different types of proceedings, please specify.

The laws transposing the two equality Directives provide for civil and criminal judicial procedures and for the administrative procedure before the equality body. Associations may engage in all three of these procedures without any differences in their standing according to the different types of proceedings.

- f) What type of remedies may associations seek and obtain? If there are any differences in associations' standing in terms of remedies compared to actual victims, please specify

The laws are silent on this point but it may safely be assumed that associations may seek the same remedies as individuals applying to the Courts directly, which would be compensation and, in the case of unlawful dismissal, reinstatement. The Equality Body does not have the power to award compensation or order reinstatement and a complainant, whether the victim or an organisation acting on the victim's behalf, cannot request the imposition of fine or the issuing of a binding decision by the Equality Body, which are discretionary.

- g) Are there any special rules on the shifting burden of proof where associations are engaged in proceedings?

(i). The Equal Treatment (Race and Ethnic Origin) Law N. 59(I)/2004 (transposing the Racial Equality Directive) does not expressly provide that the burden of proof is reversed where organisations engage in proceedings on behalf of victims. Article 7 of the law provides for the right to resort to the judicial process and the principle of the reversal of the burden of proof. Article 8 provides for the competent Courts to try disputes arising under the law. Article 9 provides for the resort to the Equality Body. The right of organisation to represent their members is contained in article 12 which states that organisations can exercise the rights deriving under articles 8 and 9. It is the author's view that this is a clerical error on the part of the drafter or the printer and that the intention of the law maker was to refer to the rights deriving under articles 7 and 9. This becomes evident if one is to examine the wording of the other laws transposing the equality Directives.

(ii). In the case of the Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation Law N.58(I)/2004 (transposing roughly the Employment Equality Directive minus the disability component) the burden of proof is reversed in the case of organisations engaged in judicial proceedings as well as in proceedings before the Equality Body. Article 14 of Law N.58(I)/2004 reads: "Organisations of workers or other organisations with a legitimate interest may with their members' consent exercise in their name the rights deriving under articles 11 and 13". Article 11 provides for resort to the judicial process and for the reversal of the burden of proof; article 13 provides for resort to the procedure before the Equality Body.

(iii). In the Law on Persons with Disability N.127(I)/2000 as amended by the law (roughly) transposing the disability component of the Employment Equality Directive the drafter adopted the same line as in Law 58(I)/2004 transposing the Employment Equality Directive. The right to resort to the judicial process and the principle of the reversal of the burden of proof are both contained in single provision (article 9A). A separate provision (article 9C) provides for the resort to the Equality Body. The right of organisation to represent their members is contained in article 9D which states that organisations can exercise the rights deriving under articles 9A and 9C. In effect, organisations are authorised to engage in proceedings on behalf of victims both before the Courts and before the Equality body and the principle of reversal of the burden of proof applies in the case of judicial proceedings.

The author believes that result achieved in (ii) and (iii) was also intended in (i); however this was not achieved as a result of an oversight. It may well be, however, that the Courts will not interpret these provisions in the same manner. In the case of the law (roughly) transposing the Racial Equality Directive (N.59(I)/2004), it is highly likely that the Court will not allow the reversal of the burden of proof, as this is not expressly provided in the law; the law will be interpreted in its own right without reference to the other laws transposing the equality Directives.

h) Does national law allow associations to act in the public interest on their own behalf, without a specific victim to support or represent (actio popularis)? Please describe in detail the applicable rules, including the types of associations having such standing, the conditions for them to meet, the types of proceedings they may use, the types of remedies they may seek, and any special rules concerning the shifting burden of proof.

There is no such provision in the legislation; in the absence of an express provision it is unlikely that the Courts will accept such an action, given that in the past they did reject claims because the law did not expressly provide for the right sought by the applicant.⁵²⁹

⁵²⁹ In Eleni Kyriakidou v Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation (Supreme Court case no. 18/2008, dated 03.12.2010) the Supreme Court found the applicant lacked legitimate interest because there was no express legislative provision giving her the right she was seeking to enforce through the Courts. The case is reported above.

The Equality Body does accept and investigate complaints from associations (e.g. the RAXEN National Focal Point, the confederation of disability organisations KYSOA, anti-racist NGOs, the Social Welfare Committee of the Parliament of the Elderly) acting in the public interest on their own behalf without a specific victim to support (e.g. 'Roma pupils' in general or 'female migrant workers' in general, 'persons with disability', 'migrants', 'drivers aged over 70' respectively, etc). This should however be attributed to the liberal approach followed by the Equality Body rather than an interpretation of the law allowing actio popularis.

- i) Does national law allow associations to act in the interest of more than one individual victim (class action) for claims arising from the same event? Please describe in detail the applicable rules, including the types of associations having such standing, the conditions for them to meet, the types of proceedings they may use, the types of remedies they may seek, and any special rules concerning the shifting burden of proof.

The laws transposing the equality Directives are silent on the possibility of organisations representing more than one complainants at the same time but do not expressly prohibit this either. Law No. 58(I)/2004 transposing roughly the Employment Equality Directive states, in Article 14, that organisations may, with their members' permission, exercise the right to apply to the Courts or to the Equality body on behalf of their members. The plural is used when referring to 'members' but it is not clear whether this enables class actions to be taken out by organisations in their members' names. The equivalent provision in Law 59(I)/2004 uses the singular when referring to the member to be represented (article 12). The civil procedure rules make provision for class actions but only when these refer to the same subject-matter, in this case the same discriminatory treatment or act. The Equality Body does accept and investigation complaints from associations acting in the interest of more than one victim, as indicated above.

6.3 Burden of proof (Article 8 Directive 2000/43, Article 10 Directive 2000/78)

Does national law require or permit a shift of the burden of proof from the complainant to the respondent? Identify the criteria applicable in the full range of existing procedures and concerning the different types of discrimination, as defined by the Directives (including harassment).

Initially, when the laws purporting to transpose the two equality Directives came in force, the laws required that in a civil procedure there was a shift of the burden of proof from the complainant to the respondent, once the complainant has established a prima facie case of discrimination. The respondent could rebut the presumption of prima facie discrimination by disproving the allegations that no violation of the law occurred or that it had no adverse effect on the complainant.⁵³⁰

⁵³⁰ Law N.58(I)/2004, Section11; Law N.59(I)/2004, Section7.

The law did not reverse the burden of proof for procedures before the equality body. For cases involving racial/ethnic discrimination in fields other than employment and occupation, the law provided that should the respondent fail to rebut the presumption of discrimination, then the District Court considers that the breach has been established and the complainant is required to present on oath all relevant facts to assess the damages.⁵³¹

However, the Directives' requirements were not met in full and subsequently, following a request from the European Commission, the three laws were amended. In particular:

- In November 2006 a new law came into force⁵³² which amended the 2004 law transposing (partly) the Racial Equality Directive.⁵³³ The amendment, which was introduced in order to comply with a request from the European Commission, provides that the burden of proof is reversed not only in civil proceedings, as was the case with the 2004 law, but in "all [judicial] proceedings except criminal ones", in order to cover also administrative proceedings. Moreover, under the 2004 law the claimant had to prove facts from which a violation could be inferred; this has now changed to a duty to merely introduce (rather than prove) such facts, upon which the burden of proof is automatically reversed. Finally, under the 2004 law, the accused was absolved from liability if he proved that his violation had no negative impact on the claimant; the new law removed this provision.
- On 18.5.2007 an amendment to the Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation Law N.58(I)/2004 (roughly transposing the Employment Equality Directive) was passed. As was the case with Law 59(I)/2004 (above), the amendment introduced the following changes: (a) the burden of proof is reversed in "all judicial proceedings except criminal ones"; (b) the claimant no longer has to prove facts from which a violation can be inferred, but merely to introduce such facts, upon which the burden of proof is automatically reversed; (c) the accused is no longer absolved from liability if he proves that his violation had no negative impact on the claimant; and (d) the aforesaid right is extended also to trade unions or other organisations with a legal standing who are, with the victim's permission, either suing the perpetrator in court or submitting a complaint to the equality body.
- Towards the end of 2007, a new law was enacted in order to bring the disability law in line with the burden of proof provision of the Employment Equality Directive.

⁵³¹ Law N.59(I)/2004, Section 7.

⁵³² Law amending the Equal Treatment (Racial or Ethnic origin) No. 147(I)/2006

⁵³³ Law N. 59(I)/2004

The new law (72(I)/2007) amended the old law (57(I)/2004) by: extending the scope of applicability of the reversal of proof principle to include administrative litigation proceedings (in addition to civil proceedings); removing the requirement for the claimant to prove (instead of merely introduce) facts from which a violation can be inferred, upon which the burden of proof is automatically reversed; deleting the provision that the accused is absolved from liability if s/he proves that her/his violation had no negative impact on the claimant.

In the case of the Equality Body, since it has the power to carry out its own investigations to establish the facts of a case, the procedure may be said to fall within the exception of Article 8(5) of the Racial Equality Directive and therefore reversal of the burden of proof is not required.

Provisions for shifting the burden of proof to the employer once a prima facie case of dismissal is established already exist in cases of unfair dismissal. The Termination of Employment Law 1967, as amended, is phrased in such a way that imposes the burden of proof on the employer, i.e. the employer has to prove that an employee had been dismissed for one of the reasons that permit summary dismissal. If the alleged unreasonableness, resulting in dismissal, is based on discrimination, the burden of proof is on the employer to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that he had acted reasonably.

6.4 Victimisation (Article 9 Directive 2000/43, Article 11 Directive 2000/78)

What protection exists against victimisation? Does the protection against victimisation extend to people other than the complainant? (e.g. witnesses, or someone who helps the victim of discrimination to bring a complaint)

Identical provisions against victimisation are to be found in all three laws enacted to transpose Directives 2000/78 and 2000/43. The said provisions prohibit any adverse treatment or consequence towards any person who files a complaint or is involved in a procedure aiming at implementing the principle of equal treatment.⁵³⁴ Therefore any person involved in the procedure in a capacity other than as a complainant (e.g. as a witness or as a lawyer or as a person helping a victim to present a complaint) is also covered by the protection against victimisation.

⁵³⁴ The Equal Treatment (Racial or Ethnic Origin) Law No. 59(I) /2004 (31.3.2004), Section 11; The Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation of 2004 No. 58 (1)/2004 (31.3.2004), Section 10. The Law on Persons with Disabilities N. 57(I)/2004 (31.03.2004), Section 7, amending Section 9E of the basic law.

The Laws on the Commissioner for Administration 1991-2004⁵³⁵ provide a more detailed description of the scope of the protection against victimisation: “Anyone who refuses to employ, dismisses or threatens to dismiss from work, influences or threatens to influence, frightens or forces any other person or imposes any monetary or other punishment to any other person because such person has (i) submitted or intends to submit a complaint to be investigated by the Equality body; (ii) has supplied or presented or intends to supply or submit any information or documents to the Equality body; (iii) has testified or intends to testify before the Equality body, is guilty of an offence and is subject to imprisonment not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding CYP300⁵³⁶ or to both penalties.”⁵³⁷ As stated above, the Laws on the Commissioner for Administration 1991-2004 are expressly stated to apply also to the new mandate, duties and powers bestowed upon the ombudsman as equality body under the new anti-discrimination laws.⁵³⁸

The Code of conduct on disability discrimination at the workplace issued by the Equality Body in September 2010 defines victimization as the unfavorable treatment of a person (who may or may not have a disability) owing to the fact that: s/he gave evidence or testified against an employer in judicial or other procedures for investigation of discrimination complaints by persons with disabilities; s/he alleged that some employer is in breach of the law against a person with a disability; s/he encouraged or supported a person with a disability to submit a complaint or bring a legal action for discrimination. It is not necessary for the victim to have actually assisted in the investigation of a complaint against the employer; it is sufficient to prove that the employer treated him/her unfairly believing or suspecting that s/he did so or was intending to do so.

Special protection against victimization of complainants is also afforded by the Law Concerning the Equal Treatment of Men and Women in Employment and Occupational Training of 2002 which provides in Article 17(1) that “...the dismissal as well as the adverse alteration of the conditions of employment of an employee who has submitted a complaint or protested with the intention of implementing the principle of equal treatment, including complaints for violation of the present Law, or of an employee who resisted or reported sexual harassment, is absolutely invalid unless the employer proves that the dismissal or adverse alteration is due to a reason irrelevant to the complaint or protest or resistance of sexual harassment.”

Furthermore, Article 9 of the Law on Equal Pay between Men and Women for the same work or for work of equal value N. 177(I)/2002 states that “no one shall be dismissed or shall be subjected to unfavourable treatment by his/her employer on the ground that (s)he has complained or testified or contributed to the prosecution of a perpetrator or to the adoption of any measures on the basis of the present law”.

⁵³⁵ Laws N. 3/1991; N. 98(I)/1994; N.101(I)/1995; N.1(I)/2000; N.36(I)/2004.

⁵³⁸ Section 3(8) of Law N.36(I)/2004.

6.5 Sanctions and remedies (Article 15 Directive 2000/43, Article 17 Directive 2000/78)

- a) What are the sanctions applicable where unlawful discrimination has occurred? Consider the different sanctions that may apply where the discrimination occurs in private or public employment, or in a field outside employment.

The Equality body does not have the power to award damages to victims of discrimination, but its decisions may be relied upon to seek damages for unlawful discrimination in a district Court or a labour tribunal, depending on whether the dispute concerns employment or fields beyond employment.

Strictly speaking, the Court may award all types of damages available in civil procedures, like pecuniary, nominal or punitive damages but no case of discrimination relying on the new laws has been decided in Courts yet to allow for any conclusions to be drawn with regard to the practice followed.⁵³⁹ Punitive damages are very rarely awarded and, generally speaking, the amounts awarded by the Cyprus Courts tend to be rather low compared to the damages awarded in other countries.

In addition to damages, a victim of discrimination may apply to the labour tribunal seeking reinstatement to a position from which s/he was unlawfully dismissed, but again this is a remedy rarely sought or used.

Law 42(I)/2004 vests the equality body with powers beyond those prescribed by the two EU Directives: the power to receive and investigate complaints of discriminatory treatment, behaviour, regulation, condition, criterion or practice prohibited by law; the power to issue reports of findings; the power to issue orders (through publication in the Official Gazette) for the elimination, within a specified time limit⁵⁴⁰ and in a specified way, of the situation which directly produced discrimination, although such right is somewhat limited by a number of exceptions.⁵⁴¹

⁵³⁹ In the only single case adjudicated in Cyprus no award was made because the labour tribunal decided it had no jurisdiction to try a case about discrimination in the selection procedure for a job placement: Avgoustina Hajiavraam v. The Cooperative Credit Company of Morphou, reported above under section 3.6.2.

⁵⁴⁰ Which time limit shall not exceed 90 days from publication in the Official gazette (The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004), Section 28).

⁵⁴¹ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004), Sections 14(2) and 14(3), Part III, list the limitations to the Commissioner's power to issue orders as follows: where the act complained of is pursuant to another law or regulation, in which case the Commissioner advises the Attorney General accordingly, who will advise the competent Ministry and/or the Council of Ministers about measures to be taken to remedy the situation [The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004), Sections 39(3) and 39(4)]; and where discrimination did not occur exclusively as a result of violation of the relevant law; where there is no practical direct way of eradicating the situation or where such eradication would adversely affect third parties; where the eradication cannot take place without violating contractual obligations of persons of private or public law; where the complainant does not wish for an order to be issued; or where the situation complained of no longer subsists.

The equality body is further empowered to impose small fines which cannot exceed CYP350 (Euros 598) for discriminatory behaviour, treatment or practice; CYP250 (Euros 427) for racial discrimination in the enjoyment of a right or freedom; CYP350 (Euros 598) for non-compliance with the recommendation within the specified time limit; and CYP50 (Euros 85.44) daily for continuing non-compliance after the deadline set by the equality body.⁵⁴² Generally speaking, the fines are very low; they offer little deterrence to potential perpetrators and they are hardly ever imposed by the equality body: since its inception, the Equality Body imposed a fine on only one case concerning gender.

The Equality Body may also issue recommendations to the person against whom a complaint has been lodged, and to supervise compliance with orders issued against persons found guilty of discrimination.⁵⁴³ It is possible for the equality body to recommend school desegregation plans or the instigation of disciplinary proceedings against teachers or other persons guilty of discrimination; in practice, however, the Equality body's recommendations hardly ever propose measures as drastic as that and there is a clear tendency towards 'diplomacy' and mediation, evidenced by the fact that no binding decisions have been issued so far and no fines have been imposed yet (except in a case involving gender discrimination).

All orders, fines and recommendations issued or imposed under this Law are subject to annulment⁵⁴⁴ by the Supreme Court of Cyprus upon an appeal lodged by a person with a 'vested interest'.⁵⁴⁵ There is no requirement for special measures to be taken to ensure that persons with disabilities have access to the equality body and no such measures are taken for the time being.

In addition to the right to investigate complaints submitted by individuals or organisations, the equality body may also investigate issues on his/her own right where it deems that any particular case that came to its attention may constitute a violation of the law.⁵⁴⁶ The Equality Body is empowered to issue recommendations to the person or group found guilty of discriminatory behaviour as to alternative treatment or conduct, abolition or substitution of the provision, term, criterion or practice. In fact, all cases investigated by the Equality Body until now have led to recommendations, as opposed to binding decisions. The recommendations have often taken the form of suggesting to the authorities or to the private sector, to revise their practices over specific issues complained of.

⁵⁴⁶ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/2004 (19.03.2004), Section 33.

Reports issued by the equality body have, for instance, recommended to insurance companies to revise their practice of refusing to insure persons of Pontian Greek origin; to employers to remove the maximum age limit fixed for advertised jobs; to the public nursing school to revise its entry requirements so as not to exclude persons with disabilities; to the immigration authorities to remove from the standard contract of employment of migrant workers a clause prohibiting them from joining trade unions; to insurance companies to revise their policy of not insuring persons over 70 to drive cars or charging a higher premium for it, etc.

The findings and reports of the Equality Body must be communicated to the Attorney General who will, in turn advise on the adoption or not of appropriate legislative or administrative measures, taking into account the state's international law obligations and who will at the same time prepare legislation for the abolition or substitution of the relevant legislative provision. The findings of the Equality Body are also communicated to the House of the Representatives.

Under Law N.59 (I)/2004 transposing (roughly) the Racial Equality Directive, the competent courts to try discrimination cases at first instance are the District Courts.⁵⁴⁷ The same law also provides for the complainant's right to lodge a complaint to the Equality body.⁵⁴⁸ Furthermore, persons alleging discriminatory behaviour from public authorities may, under Article 146 of the Cyprus Constitution,⁵⁴⁹ appeal to the Supreme Court of Cyprus for an order to set aside the administrative decision complained of. Under Law N.58 (I)/2004 transposing the Employment Equality Directive (minus the disability component), the competent court to try discrimination cases at first instance is the Labour Tribunal. The legal vacuum which had been created in 2008 by the decision in the case of Hadjiavraam was remedied in 2009 for all grounds except disability, by an amendment of the law, which now provides that all disputes arising under this law must be deemed as labour disputes.

Under law 59(I)/2004 (transposing the Race Directive minus the employment component) the penalty to be imposed by the Court against a physical person found to be guilty, is a maximum of CYP4.000 (Euros 6,835.27) and/or imprisonment of up to six months. For legal persons the maximum penalty is CYP7.000 (Euros 1,196.72). An offence committed under the same law out of gross negligence carries a penalty of up to CYP2000 for physical persons. If the offence has been committed out gross negligence, the fine for physical persons is up to CYP2.000 (Euro 3,417.63); for legal persons, there is a fine of up to CYP2.000 (Euro 3,417.63) for the managing director, chairman, director, secretary or other officer if it can be proven that the offence was committed with his/her consent plus an additional fine of up to CYP4.000 (Euro 6,835.27) for the company or organisation.⁵⁵⁰

⁵⁵⁰ The Equal Treatment (Racial or Ethnic Origin) Law No. 59(I) /2004 (31.3.2004) Section 13.

Under law 58(I)/2004 (transposing the Employment Directive) the penalties are identical to those provided for the law transposing the Race Directive.⁵⁵¹ Same applies to procedures and penalties under Law N.57 (I)/2004 on persons with disabilities.⁵⁵² No such fines have been imposed by the Courts so far.

There are also penal remedies against discrimination. With the adoption of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, as well as with the subsequent amendments (Law 11(III)/92 and Law 28(III)/99), Cyprus established, in conformity with a recommendation of the Committee for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, a number of offences relevant to combating racism and intolerance, such as incitement to racial hatred, participation in organisations promoting racial discrimination, public expression of racially insulting ideas and discriminatory refusal to provide goods and services. The scope of this latter provision⁵⁵³ is stated to extend to goods or services supplied by a person in the course of his/her profession, but it is not defined any further and may thus be presumed to apply to, inter alia, health, education and training.

As a result of these amendments, it is no longer necessary that the incitement to racial hatred is intentional for the corresponding offence to be committed; in addition, for the refusal to provide goods and services to constitute an offence, it is no longer necessary that race be the sole ground of discrimination⁵⁵⁴. The section referring to the refusal to provide goods and services has resulted in at least one conviction.⁵⁵⁵ The Criminal Code (Cap.154) Article 51A provides that whoever publicly and in any way "procures the inhabitants to acts of violence against each other or to mutual discord or foments the creation of a spirit of intolerance is guilty of a misdemeanour and is liable to imprisonment of up to twelve months or to a fine.

The law ratifying the Additional Protocol to the Convention on Cyber crime concerning the Criminalisation of Acts of Racist or Xenophobic Nature committed through Computer Systems⁵⁵⁷ also creates a number of criminal offences, each of which is punishable with a prison sentence of up to five years and/or a fine of up to CYP20.000 (Euros 34,176.35):

⁵⁵¹ The Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation Law No. 58 (1)/2004 (31.3.2004), Section 15.

⁵⁵² Law on Persons with Disabilities N. 57(I)/2004 Section 6, amending Section 9 of the basic law.

⁵⁵³ Article 2A(4) of Law 28(III)1999.

⁵⁵⁴ Section 2A (4) "Any person who supplies goods or services by profession and refuses such supply to another by reason of his racial or ethnic origin or his religion, or who makes such supply subject to a condition relating to the racial or ethnic origin or to the religion of a person is guilty of an offence and is liable to imprisonment not exceeding one year or to a fine not exceeding four hundred pounds or to both such punishments" [about 6700 euro].

⁵⁵⁵ In criminal case No. 31330/99 dated 12 December 2001 where the accused was actually convicted and a term of imprisonment was imposed.

⁵⁵⁶ The fines are up to 1,000 Cyprus Pounds for individuals and 3,000 pounds for legal persons [1,000 Cyprus Pounds amounts to 1,708 Euros; 3,000 Cyprus Pounds amount to 5,126 Euros].

⁵⁵⁷ The Additional Protocol to the Convention against Cybercrime concerning the Criminalisation of Acts of Racist or Xenophobic Nature committed through Computer Systems (Ratification) Law N. 26(III)/2004.

- a) Article 4 criminalises the dissemination of racist and xenophobic material through a computer system.
- b) Article 5 criminalises racially and xenophobically motivated threat disseminated through a computer system.
- c) Article 6 criminalises racist and xenophobically motivated insult.
- d) Article 7 criminalises the denial, gross minimisation, approval or justification of genocide or crimes against humanity.
- e) Article 8 criminalises the aiding and abetting of any of the crimes provided for in Articles 4-7 of the law.

There are no distinctions as to sanctions in the private and the public domain, at least in the legislation, nor does the law make any differentiation as to the sanctions within and beyond employment.

- b) Is there any ceiling on the maximum amount of compensation that can be awarded?

No.

- c) Is there any information available concerning:
 - the average amount of compensation available to victims
 - the extent to which the available sanctions have been shown to be - or are likely to be effective, proportionate and dissuasive, as required by the Directives?

The Equality Body is not entitled to award compensation but its decisions may be used in Court in order to obtain compensation. There have not been any Court decisions so far applying the new anti-discrimination laws and thus no award of compensation to victims, apart from the case of Hadjiavraam where no award of compensation was made, due to the Court claiming lack of jurisdiction.

It is not possible to make a final assessment as to whether or not the sanctions are adequate, effective, proportionate and dissuasive as there has not been a case tried in Court yet. The law does not provide for 'punitive damages' to be paid by the perpetrator to the victim to act as (a) disincentive for offenders and (b) incentive for victims to complain (and in particular as incentive for lawyers to specialise). In the case of Avgoustina Hadjiavraam v. The Cooperative Credit Company of Morphou (reported above), although the tribunal made no award claiming lack of jurisdiction, it nevertheless proceeded to give its reasoning on the merits of the case. On the issue of measurement of compensation, the tribunal found that the sum of 1,500 Euros would be appropriate as this represents three salaries which would have been paid to the applicant had she been hired. In order to arrive at this conclusion, the tribunal relied on the CJEU decision in the Case C-180/95 Draehmpaehl [1997] ECR I-2195 which established that three salaries are sufficient to satisfy the three preconditions which the amount of compensation awarded must satisfy (essential protection, deterrent and proportional to the damage) in those cases where the job candidate would not have been hired even in the absence of age discrimination.

It is safe to state that the sanctions which the Equality body is allowed to levy are too low to have any dissuasive effect, although the main incentive for compliance is likely to be public image.

In 2006 the Law on Compensation of Victims of Violent Crimes N.51(I)/1997, was amended by Law 126(I)/2006 in order to extend its scope to include, inter alia, EU citizens and to create a regime for cases of a “cross-border nature”. However the Cypriot law does not transpose the aforesaid Directive in its entirety nor does it refer to it in the text of the law. There are no court decisions on this matter either. Article 22 of Law Revising the Legal Framework Governing the Special Protection of Persons who are Victims of Trafficking and Exploitation N.8(I)/2007 provides for the trafficked victim’s right to compensation from the perpetrator. Article 23 of the law also provides for the victim’s right to compensation from the state. Article 29(2)(f) provides for the obligation of the state welfare services to inform victims of their right to compensation from the perpetrator under the aforesaid article 22 but there is no obligation to inform the victim of her right to compensation from the state under article 23. Article 44 of the law provides that the victim’s repatriation must be done in a manner that will not adversely affect any procedure for claim of compensation from the perpetrator under article 22, but again no mention is made of the procedure under article 23. There are no precedents of victims claiming or receiving compensation. In an interview to the writer dated 30.04.2008, NGO Stigma which used to run the only private shelter for trafficked women,⁵⁵⁸ has reported that no victim was ever able to make use of the compensation right, because as soon as the criminal trial against the perpetrator is finished, the victims are deported or ‘repatriated voluntarily’.

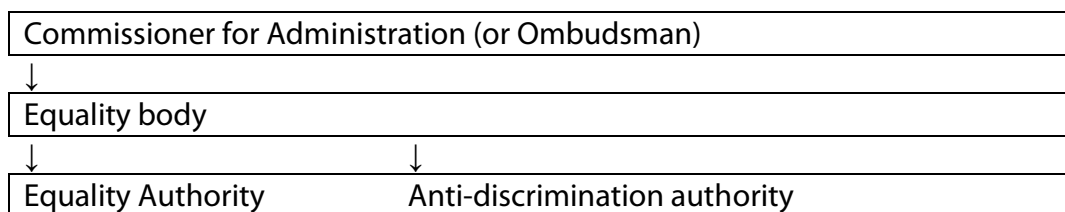

⁵⁵⁸ The shelter closed down on 31.12.2009 for lack of funding.

7 SPECIALISED BODIES, Body for the promotion of equal treatment (Article 13 Directive 2000/43)

When answering this question, if there is any data regarding the activities of the body (or bodies) for the promotion of equal treatment, include reference to this (keeping in mind the need to examine whether the race equality body is functioning properly). For example, annual reports, statistics on the number of complaints received in each year or the number of complainants assisted in bringing legal proceedings.

- a) Does a 'specialised body' or 'bodies' exist for the promotion of equal treatment irrespective of racial or ethnic origin?(Body/bodies that correspond to the requirements of Article 13. If the body you are mentioning is not the designated body according to the transposition process, please clearly indicate so.)

Yes, the Commissioner for Administration (also referred to as 'the Ombudsman'), was appointed as the national specialised equality body, in compliance with Article 13 of the Racial Equality Directive.⁵⁵⁹ Under this law, two separate authorities are set up within the equality body: the 'Equality Authority' and the 'Anti-discrimination authority', dealing respectively with employment issues and with discrimination in fields beyond employment. In this report, for ease of reference, both authorities are referred to as the 'equality body'.

- b) Describe briefly the status of this body (or bodies) including how its governing body is selected, its sources of funding and to whom it is accountable.

The Ombudsman is appointed by the President of the Republic for a fixed term of office which is six years, following a recommendation from the Council of Ministers and with the prior written agreement of the majority of the House of Parliament.⁵⁶⁰ The Ombudsman can only be dismissed, during the term of his/her service, in the same way as Supreme Court judges are dismissed.⁵⁶¹

⁵⁶⁰ The Commissioner for Administration Laws 1991-2004 (N.3/1991, N.98(I)/1994, N.101(I)/1995, N.1(I)/2000, N.36(I)/2004) section 3(1).

⁵⁶¹ The Commissioner for Administration Laws 1991-2004 (N.3/1991, N.98(I)/1994, N.101(I)/1995, N.1(I)/2000, N.36(I)/2004) section 3(7).

According to the Cypriot Constitution, a Supreme Court judge is appointed as a permanent member of the judicial service until he/she reaches the age of sixty-eight⁵⁶² and may only “be retired”⁵⁶³ due to such mental or physical incapacity or infirmity as would render him incapable of discharging his duties, or may be dismissed on the ground of misconduct.⁵⁶⁴

The budget for the Ombudsman’s office comes from the state national budget. Occasionally, the Ombudsman (in its capacity as equality body) applies for and is awarded EU funds for particular projects, such as the two opinion surveys it carried out in 2007, the code of conduct on disability discrimination and the guidelines for the media it published in 2010. However the funding for its infrastructure and operation costs emanates exclusively from the state. There is no separate budget for the Equality Body, whose budget is part of the Ombudsman’s budget. There is no governing body, only various departments specialising in particular tasks, managed by members of staff. The Ombudsman is an independent officer and is not answerable to any other body, although it is supposed to submit an annual Report of her activities to the President of the Republic and to the House of Representatives.

The Equality Body is vested with the power to (i) combat racist and indirectly racist discrimination as well as discrimination forbidden by law and generally discrimination on the grounds of race, community, language, colour, religion, political or other beliefs and national or ethnic origin⁵⁶⁵; (ii) promote equality of the enjoyment of rights and freedoms safeguarded by the Cyprus Constitution (Part II) or by one or more of the Conventions ratified by Cyprus and referred to explicitly in the Law⁵⁶⁶ irrespective of race, community, language, colour, religion, political or other beliefs, national or ethnic origin⁵⁶⁷ and (iii) promote equality of opportunity irrespective of grounds listed in the preceding section (to which the grounds of special needs⁵⁶⁸ and sexual orientation are added) in the areas of employment, access to vocational training, working conditions including pay, membership to trade unions or other associations, social insurance and medical care, education and access to goods and services including housing.

⁵⁶² Article 7(1) of the Cyprus Constitution.

⁵⁶⁴ Articles 7(3) and 7(4) of the Cypriot Constitution, respectively.

⁵⁶⁵ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/2004 (19.03.2004), Section 3.(1).(a), Part I..

⁵⁶⁶ These Conventions are: Protocol 12 of the European Convention for Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms; the International Convention for the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination; the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities; the Covenant for Civil and Political Rights and the Convention Against Torture and Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment.

⁵⁶⁷ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/2004 (19.03.2004), Section 3(1).(b), Part I.

⁵⁶⁸ ‘Special needs’ is a term commonly used in Cyprus to encompass all types of disabilities including mental disabilities. In Cyprus, the term ‘disability’ is not understood to include mental disability which is considered to be a special category requiring more sensitive treatment.

Its mandate covers all five grounds of the two anti-discrimination Directives but extends even further to include gender, nationality, community as well as rights and freedoms contained in the Cypriot Constitution and in international conventions ratified by the Republic of Cyprus.

Complaints data

At the time of writing, the anti-discrimination authority of the equality body (dealing with fields beyond employment) had not completed the processing of data concerning 2010 but informed the author that the number of complaints received in 2010 for the five grounds falling under the two Equality Directives was 157.⁵⁶⁹ The number of complaints investigated was 154 but this includes backlog of complaints from the previous year or years. The grounds were as follows:

2010- Anti discrimination Authority

Ground	Number of complaints
Race/Ethnic origin	121
Age	8
Religion	18
Disability	9
TOTAL	57

During 2010 the anti-discrimination authority completed and issued 25 reports; the rest were letters to inform complainants that the investigation was interrupted for various reasons, that their complaint was groundless or other reasons. It should be noted however that the 25 reports do not necessarily mean that the complaints were well founded in all of these cases.

For the year 2010, the Equality Authority of the Equality Body (dealing with employment issues) has supplied the following data which concerns the five grounds of the two Equality Directives:

⁵⁶⁹ Both authorities of the Equality Body receive and examine complaints on the ground of gender which are not included in the data presented here.

2010- Equality Authority

Ground	Number of complaints	Complainant's Profile (gender)	Complainant's profile (individual or group)	Result
Ethnic origin	22	13 women 8 men	21 individuals 1 organisation	Investigation interrupted: 10 Compliance after intervention 1 Report was issued: 1 Pending 10
Age	12	2 women 9 men	11 individuals 1 organisation	Investigation interrupted: 3 Pending 5 Outside jurisdiction:1 Groundless 3
Religion	2	1 woman 1 man	none	Both pending
Belief	1	man	None	Pending
TOTAL	37	16 women 19	35 individuals 2 organisations	Investigation interrupted: 13 Compliance after intervention: 1 Pending: 18 Report was issued: 1 Outside jurisdiction: 1 Groundless: 3

During 2010 the Equality Authority did not deal with any complaints regarding disability or sexual orientation.

- d) Does it / do they have the competence to provide independent assistance to victims, conduct independent surveys and publish independent reports, and issue recommendations on discrimination issues?

Under article 44 of the Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004, the Equality Body has the power to conduct independent surveys on any matter within its competency concerning any activity or practice in the public or private domain.⁵⁷⁰

The only assistance offered to victims is the investigation of their complaints and the issuing of the decision. In recent years a system was introduced whereby the various officers of this body take turns in answering phonecalls from the public and offer oral advice on rights and procedures available.

The equality body may carry out independent investigations into various issues⁵⁷¹ on its own right where it deems that any particular case may constitute a violation of the law.⁵⁷² The equality body may also issue codes of good practice regarding the activities of any persons in both the private and public sector, obliging them to take practical measures for the purpose of promoting equality of opportunity irrespective of community, racial, national or ethnic origin, religion, language and colour.⁵⁷³

The equality body has the duty to make recommendations to the competent Minister, the parliament and affected groups of persons on, inter alia, the amendment of any legal provision or regulation which constitutes unlawful discrimination. The law empowers the equality body to issue such recommendations either in its own right⁵⁷⁴ or following a specific complaint to that effect referred to the equality body.⁵⁷⁵

⁵⁷⁰ In 2007, in the framework of the European Year for Equal Opportunities, the Equality Body commissioned two independent surveys on perceptions of the Greek Cypriots issues pertaining to discrimination on the ground of racial/ethnic origin. Both surveys were funded by the European Commission.

⁵⁷¹ E.g. Investigation regarding the detention of mental patients in prisons and the medical care of prisoners, Report No. 1/2000, 31.05.2000; Investigation into the prison system in Cyprus and the conditions of detention in central prisons, Report No. 1/2004, 26.05.2004; Investigation into the conditions of detention of foreigners in central prisons and police detention centres, Report No. 1/2005, 02.02.2005.

⁵⁷³ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004), Sections 40, 41 and 42, Part VI.

⁵⁷⁴ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004), Section 35(1)(d).

⁵⁷⁵ The Combating of Racial and Some Other Forms of Discrimination (Commissioner) Law No. 42(1)/ 2004 (19.03.2004), Section 36(1)(b).

In addition, the law casts an obligation on the equality body to communicate its findings and reports to the Attorney General who will, in turn advise the Republic on the adoption or not of appropriate legislative or administrative measures and prepare legislation for the abolition or substitution of the legislative provision which is contrary to the anti-discrimination law.⁵⁷⁶ However, as it is currently phrased, the law allows the discriminatory law to remain in force until officially amended by the House of Parliament. This is a discrepancy in the law that renders compliance with the Directives questionable, because it allows for the law to remain in force even if the Attorney General delays or omits to take steps for its amendment.

The equality body can make binding recommendations⁵⁷⁷ ordering the guilty party to take steps to rectify the discrimination, for instance in the form of ordering the provision of goods and services which had been denied to the victim, including housing, education, health care⁵⁷⁸ and in the form of requesting the discontinuation of a certain practice that causes discrimination.⁵⁷⁹ Although the total of these recommendations could potentially form part of a comprehensive code of conduct, the equality body has not as yet proceeded to the compilation of such a multi-purpose document (except regarding sexual harassment at the workplace), limiting its activity within the area of investigating complaints and conducting self-initiated investigations into various human rights issues. At the beginning of 2006, the equality body commissioned an opinion survey into public attitudes on homosexuality. The results, which were presented in a special event organised by the equality body and given media coverage, showed highly increased levels of intolerance towards homosexuals, a fact confirmed by Eurobarometer results.⁵⁸⁰ However, the Equality Body did not yet proceed to the issue of such a code.

The Equality Body has the power and the duty to monitor compliance with its decisions and to impose fines for non-compliance within the prescribed period. The Equality Body's orders must be published in the Official Gazette.

The Equality Body has no power to impose criminal sanctions; all criminal cases are referred to the Attorney General's office for action. Also, where there is a disciplinary offence, the Equality Body has the duty to refer this to the competent authority: for instance if the offender is a public servant, the Equality Body must refer the case to the Minister in charge, so as to take action.

e) Does the body (or bodies) have legal standing to bring discrimination complaints or to intervene in legal cases concerning discrimination?

No, it cannot take discrimination complaints to Court nor can it intervene in litigation proceedings, although its officers may appear as witnesses. The legal officers of the Equality Body have repeatedly expressed their regret over the fact that they are not mandated to take cases to the Courts. It may be that the new Ombudsman and head of the Equality Body, a senior legal officer at the Equality Body who is taking over from her predecessor in 2011 will initiate a change to the law entitling the Equality Body to apply to the Courts on behalf of victims. Under the existing legislation, the Equality Body's duty is confined to referring cases to the Attorney General's office so as for the latter to decide whether criminal charges must be instigated or whether a law needs to be repealed or revised in order to conform to the new anti-discrimination legislation. So far, no charges have been brought against any person by the Attorney General invoking the anti-discrimination legislation.

f) Is / are the body / bodies a quasi-judicial institution? Please briefly describe how this functions. Are the decisions binding? Does the body /bodies have the power to impose sanctions? Is an appeal possible? To the body itself? To courts?) Are the decisions well respected? (Please illustrate with examples/decisions) Is the independence of the body / bodies stipulated in the law? If not, can the body/bodies be considered to be independent ? Please explain why.

No it is not a quasi-judicial institution. It does have the power to issue binding decisions as well as sanctions; however it usually opts for issuing non-binding recommendations and carrying out mediation as a more effective means of achieving results, given the low fines provided by its mandate. It is possible to appeal against a decision of the equality body by virtue of recourse to the Supreme Court under article 146 of the Constitution.

Generally speaking the recommendations of the equality body are taken seriously into consideration by the private sector and to a certain extent by the public sector with the exception of the police and the immigration authorities who have the lowest rate of compliance, according to the head of the equality body.⁵⁸¹ In her capacity as Ombudsman, she has in her Annual Reports repeatedly criticised the low compliance rate of the Aliens and Immigration Office of the Interior.

The law appointing the ombudsman as the national Equality Body (N.42(I)/2004) does not expressly provide for the independence of the body; however this is implied from several provisions which essentially give the power to the body to apply and implement the obligations undertaken by the Republic under the EU acquis as well as under international law.

⁵⁸¹ In a statement before the House of Parliament in 2004 she spoke of a 60% rate of compliance by the public sector: see Hadjivasilis M. 2004, "40% of the Ombudsman's reports in the wastebasket", in Phileleftheros, 28.10.2004.

- g) Are the tasks undertaken by the body / bodies independently (notably those listed in the Directive 2000/43; providing independent assistance to victims of discrimination in pursuing their complaints about discrimination, conducting independent surveys concerning discrimination and publishing independent reports)

Yes the tasks are generally undertaken independently, although there have been NGO allegations that the delay in examining their complaints has in essence nullified their claim. In the field of investigating complaints, there appears to be a certain reluctance in addressing the issue of discrimination against Turkish Cypriots, invoking the problematic 'doctrine of necessity', a problematic concept of doubtful legality. Assistance to victims is done privately on an ad hoc basis and it is thus impossible to monitor its independence and impartiality, although the ethos of the organisation does not raise concerns that this task would be carried out in a non-independent way. Surveys are commissioned to external contractors and are independent, although on one occasion an organisation of Pontian Greeks living in Cyprus challenged the results of a survey on the attitudes of Greek Cypriots towards this community, raising methodological issues. On the issue of the guidelines for the media, which the Equality Body published in September 2010, it is the author's view that the Equality Body has succumbed to pressures from the journalists' union not to issue a binding Code of Conduct because that was seen by the journalists as interfering with journalistic freedom. The said guidelines, the drafting of which was assigned by the Equality Body to a journalist- member of the journalists' union, omit reference to important legislation criminalising certain public statements and to ECHR decisions recognising that certain limitations to freedom of expression are necessary in a democratic society.

There are certain weaknesses to the present framework governing the Equality Body which affect its overall effectiveness. One such weakness has to do with the reluctance on the part of the government to allocate sufficient funds to it in order to make adequate staffing arrangements so as to cope with the additional duties bestowed upon it by the new legislation. The volume of the complaints submitted to the equality body is continuously increasing since its inception without the corresponding increase in staff. In 2010 three employees from the Ombudsman's office left and two were on maternity leave at the time of writing. Given a number of governmental measures to reduce the public deficit, which have led to the cancellation of a number of posts in the public service, there is an uncertainty as to whether the budget line for vacancies created in the Ombudsman's office will still be available and whether replacement staff will be hired.

This problem of understaffing became more acute since 2008, when the mandate of the equality authority (dealing with all employment issues) was extended by a new gender discrimination law which effectively means that the body will have less time to allocate to the other grounds.⁵⁸²

⁵⁸² Law on equal treatment between men and women in access to and provision of goods and services N.18(I)/2008.

Following this development, in 2008 55% of the complaints submitted to this body concerned gender discrimination; a similar picture emerged in 2009 and 2010 where 50% of the complaints concerned gender discrimination. This extension of mandate was not accompanied by an increase in the members of staff and the report describes itself as “understaffed”.⁵⁸³

A slight increase in the budget from year to year covers only the index-linked salary and other cost increases and does not allow for the hiring of additional personnel or the carrying out of any additional activities. The resources allocated to the ombudsman’s office are clearly inadequate, as often pointed in the body’s annual reports. When the ombudsman was bestowed with additional duties as equality body in 2004, no additional funds were allocated to it to enable it to carry out its new tasks. In his 2006 Report (dated 29 March 2006), the Commissioner for Human Rights of the Council of Europe, Mr. Alvaro Gil-Robles, expresses regret that the necessary increase in funding to deal with the extra work-load has not been provided to the ombudsman and recommends that greater resources be devoted to this office to enable it to deal effectively with its new competencies. Similarly, in its third Report on Cyprus dated 16 May 2006, ECRI also stresses the need for resources to be made available to the Ombudsman to enable her to respond to its tasks. The Third Opinion on Cyprus of the Advisory Committee on the Framework Convention for the protection of national minorities issued on 19.03.2010 states that the institutional framework for combating discrimination needs to be strengthened and the competent authorities provided with more adequate resources. The insufficient funding results in understaffing which in turns leads to a number of problems, mainly having to do with significant delays in investigating complaints, which is of crucial concern particularly as regards urgent cases, such as individuals about to be arbitrarily deported or in need of medical treatment or in detention. There is also a delay in publishing annual reports, which usually come over 12 months after the end of the reporting year; for the first time, the annual reports of the two bodies comprising the equality body for the year 2009 were made available in October 2010, which marks an improvement to previous years. Also, activities foreseen under the law such as the issue of codes of good practice were not possible to be issued until funding was secured from external sources. The fact that the equality body had until recently not had its own website and that the website of the ombudsman is rather basic (only in Greek, does not show statistical data and showing only a few of the reports issued) is also attributed to lack of funding.

Although Turkish is one of the two official languages of the Cypriot Republic, none of the new laws (or indeed any of the old ones) were translated into Turkish, thus rendering it difficult for Turkish speakers to be informed about and utilise the new procedures available.

⁵⁸³ In its third report on Cyprus, ECRI stresses the need for resources to be made available to the Ombudsman to enable her to respond to her tasks: Third ECRI Report on Cyprus, adopted on 16.12.2005, Strasbourg 16.05.2006, Council of Europe.

As a result, very few complaints have been received by the Equality body's office from Turkish-Cypriots, even though since the partial lifting of the restrictions in movements in April 2003, there are several thousand Turkish-Cypriots seeking employment and access to public services in the south. A third weakness is the fact that the level of awareness of the legal profession on the anti-discrimination acquis remains low and this is reflected in the fact that discrimination cases are taken to court without invoking the laws transposing the two Directives and in the fact that judges often seem unaware of the new rights, priorities and procedures created by Cyprus' accession into the EU.

The Equality Body has not been allowed to operate to its full capacity, compared to equality bodies in other EU countries; its submergence into the ombudsman has meant that it has been unable to develop and assert its own identity and is not well known to the public. It does not even have its own name: only the two authorities operating within the Equality Body have been assigned their rather confusing names: Equality Authority and Anti-discrimination Authority. As at present, the officers of the equality body have to carry out Ombudsman's duties as well and the Ombudsman's office renders secretarial and other services to the Equality Body. The Equality Body does not have its own budget; it is operating within the budget of the ombudsman, with whom the equality body shares office premises, personnel and the person at the top of the hierarchy, which is the same for both bodies. An issue of independence from the ombudsman arises, which compromises the independence and impact of the equality body. Moreover, the independence of the institution of the Ombudsman itself is compromised by two factors: the fact that its budget is allocated by the state; and the fact that the state appoints the members of staff, who are civil servants. This situation has remained constant since the body's inception in 2004.

In addition to its duties as Equality Body the Ombudsman is vested with power to investigate complaints against the public service and its public officers, including the Police and the National Guard (the army) which expressly covers investigation into complaints that acts or omissions violate human rights, and thus examines complaints as to racial and other forms of discrimination. A report⁵⁸⁴ prepared in relation to each particular case investigated, including cases of discrimination, is submitted by the Ombudsman to the authority that is responsible for the public service or public officer concerned, and a copy is sent to the complainant. In the event that the Ombudsman concludes in this report that the complainant has suffered some injury or injustice, the report also contains the Ombudsman's suggestions or recommendations to the competent authority concerned for reparation of the injury or injustice, specifying at his/her discretion the time within which such reparation must take place. If the competent authority fails to give effect to a suggestion or recommendation for reparation, the Ombudsman may make reference to this, by a special report submitted to the House of Representatives and the Council of Ministers.

⁵⁸⁴ The Commissioner submits an annual Report (which is published) to the President of the Republic, containing observations and suggestions, a copy of which is also submitted to the Council of Ministers and the House of Representatives.

The recommendations of the Ombudsman are persuasive, not binding, but the Ombudsman has proved to be the most effective body so far in dealing with questions of racial, gender and other grounds of discrimination.

h) Does the body treat Roma and Travellers as a priority issue? If so, please summarise its approach relating to Roma and Travellers.

Although not a number one priority, the equality body is concerned with the situation of the Roma and has on two occasions in 2003 conducted self-initiated investigations into their housing conditions.

No measures have been taken to raise awareness amongst the Roma community of rights and procedures available to them under the new antidiscrimination legislation, presumably as a result of the restricted budget and limited resources of the equality body and the practical difficulties involved in accessing the Roma communities (language problem, illiteracy, Roma settlements in remote locations). The equality body has not taken an active role in promoting general public awareness about the Roma or in contributing to the efforts currently undertaken by the 18th Elementary School in Limassol, where there is a large Roma concentration, in promoting human rights education.

8 IMPLEMENTATION ISSUES

8.1 Dissemination of information, dialogue with NGOs and between social partners

Describe briefly the action taken by the Member State

- a) to disseminate information about legal protection against discrimination (Article 10 Directive 2000/43 and Article 12 Directive 2000/78)
- (i). Initiatives of the Equality body

Beyond the investigation of cases, either self-initiated or pursuant to complaints, activities depend entirely on the availability of external funding, usually from EU sources. Upon its inception the equality body carried out a number of awareness raising activities to familiarise the public with the institution of the equality body and its powers. In May 2004 a series of meetings were carried out with women's organisations and the social partners, during which the head of the equality body discussed the scope of the new anti-discrimination Directives and the transposing legislation. During the same year, the equality body applied to the European Commission for funding in order to carry out an awareness campaign in the media. The grant was approved and a series of awareness raising activities were carried out in 2005, which consisted of the publication and distribution of leaflets in Greek, English and Turkish containing basic information on the new anti-discrimination legislation, and an information campaign in the media through ads and messages in newspapers and on the radio. Also, officers from the equality body participated and delivered papers in seminars, training courses and conferences. A number of seminars were carried out in 2005 with an EU grant with the object of raising public awareness on issues of discrimination, on the newly-enacted anti-discrimination legislation and on the role and competencies of the Equality Body.⁵⁸⁵ Race/ethnic origin appears to be the focus of the majority of the promotional activities of 2005. During the same year (2005) and in the framework of the same Community funded program, the equality body organised a training session for the members of the police force regarding data collection by the police of racially motivated crime.

In July 2006 the Equality Body applied again to the European Commission for funding an awareness raising campaign. The proposal was approved and the equality body produced and disseminated two 'Know your rights' leaflets, one on the right to equal treatment for persons with disability in employment and occupation and the other on gender equality in employment and occupation.

⁵⁸⁵ The subjects were: "The implementation of the principle of equality in employment. Directive 2000/78" carried out on 18.01.2005; "Racism and the Media" carried out on 21.03.2005; "Racism and the challenge of Diversity" dated 11.04.2005; and "Racism and Civilization" dated 14.11.2005. The seminars were addressed by guest speakers from abroad and were attended by the social partners, officers from governmental departments involved in the implementation of the law such as the Ministry of Education, the police, immigration officers, disability NGO representatives, other NGOs, members of the legal profession and MPs.

Also in 2006 the equality body commissioned a survey on public perceptions regarding homosexuality. Within the same line of funding, the equality body also produced the Code of Conduct on harassment and sexual harassment at the workplace, which was printed in February 2007.

In 2007 it commissioned a total of four surveys on the attitudes of various social groups regarding issues of racism and discrimination.⁵⁸⁶ The surveys have provoked sensational media coverage but cannot really be said to have brought about any significant systemic changes. In the last couple of years, the focus of the equality body has shifted towards issuing codes of conduct which are binding and are seen as a more effective method of addressing problems.⁵⁸⁷

A number of actions were undertaken by the equality body in 2010 in the framework of a PROGRESS program:

- The construction of the equality body's own website launched in the last months of 2010.⁵⁸⁸
- The Code of Conduct on disability discrimination and the guidelines on media principles against racism were printed in September 2010.
- A media campaign was carried out consisting of three TV spot, four radio spots and three print media raising public awareness on discrimination on the grounds of race, age and sexual orientation. A problem was encountered when the executive director of the state radio channel CyBC (Cyprus Broadcasting Corporation) refused to run a radio spot on sexual orientation discrimination which caused the equality body to engage private channels to run its spots; the director's decision was subsequently overturned by CyBC's governing body.
- Two information leaflets were printed in Greek on the competences of the equality body.
- An anti-discrimination training course for trade unionists was carried out in September 2010 in cooperation with PEO, the left wing confederation of trade unions.
- The financing of a number of NGOs to carry out various activities including a theatrical production concerning discrimination.
- The conducting of a survey to identify the vocational training needs of migrant women in Cyprus.
- The maintenance and upgrading of the antidiscrimination website of INEK-PEO, the research centre attached the left wing trade union PEO.

⁵⁸⁶ The subjects of the surveys were: the attitudes/beliefs of Cypriots towards people of Pontian ethnic origin, the largest ethnic minority-community; public attitudes towards sexual harassment at the workplace; attitudes/beliefs of Christian-orthodox Cypriots towards people of different religion who reside in Cyprus; and the perceptions of Cypriots towards people with disabilities.

⁵⁸⁷ So far, three such codes have been issued: on Sexual Harassment at the Workplace published in February 2007, on disability discrimination at the workplace (September 2010) and on media principles against racism, xenophobia and discrimination (September 2010).

⁵⁸⁸ <http://www.no-discrimination.ombudsman.gov.cy>

- The conducting of a survey on discrimination against migrant workers and Turkish Cypriots in employment which was still in the process of being completed at the year's end.
- A conference on the history, culture and minority rights of the three minorities of Cyprus (Armenians, Maronites and Latins) carried out in October 2010 in cooperation with the representatives of the said minorities.
- A seminar on gender mainstreaming in migration policies and practices, which was carried out in June 2010 in collaboration with a feminist NGO (the Mediterranean Institute of Gender Studies).

(ii) Governmental initiatives

In December 2004 a seminar on disability discrimination was organised by the non-governmental Pancyprian Organisation for the Blind and the Ministry of Labour under an EU funded project. Sign language translations were provided throughout and programs were issued in Braille.

Seminars are generally held in buildings which are accessible by wheelchairs. However, only the seminar of December 2004 mentioned above offered sign language translation and documents in Braille, probably reflecting the fact that it was a seminar dedicated to disability and organised by a disability organisation. Funding may also partly account for the fact that these features were made available in this event.

A number of other seminars had also been organised in 2003, including an awareness-raising Seminar on the two non-discrimination Directives, organized by the House of Representatives in which all key actors involved on the issue (Governmental and non-governmental sectors etc.) participated and had the opportunity within the framework of three workshops to express their views, to submit their suggestions and to identify needs for further activities/measures to be taken to prevent and combat racism at domestic level. A similar awareness-raising Seminar on the two Directives on non-discrimination, organised by the Ministry of Justice and Public Order and the European Commission, took place in 26 June 2003.⁵⁸⁹

On 14.12.2007 the Brussels-based Assistance Information Exchange Office – TAIEX, in co-operation with the Cypriot Ministry of Justice, the Attorney General's office, the Supreme Court and the Pancyprian Bar Association held a one-day seminar on developments in the anti-discrimination field and particularly on the transposition of Directives 2000/43 and 2000/78.

⁵⁸⁹ During this Seminar, three experts from EU countries were invited in order to explain/discuss the provisions of the two Council Directives as well as their implementation with all key actors involved in discrimination issues.

Discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation is one of the topics covered in seminars dealing with discrimination in general, although no particular support is offered to organisations working in this field nor have there been any activities targeting sexual orientation on its own. According to the president of AKOK, the national gay liberation movement, activities related to all grounds of discrimination without specifically targeting homosexuality do not bring results towards combating sexual orientation discrimination. Homosexuality continues to be a taboo subject in Cypriot society in spite of the fact that it has been decriminalised and homosexuals themselves are highly reluctant in revealing their sexual orientation to the public.

A number of anti-racist activities have been organised by the Youth Board of Cyprus with the financial support of the Government. These activities included a photographic exhibition, a camp for youth groups from Cyprus and abroad, anti-racism festivals on the occasion of the International Day of Tolerance, etc. Also, the Youth Board financed other Youth organizations anti-discrimination activities and the participation of young people to attend seminars abroad. Finally, the Youth Board finances an annual festival (Rainbow Festival) organised by the migrant support NGO KISA- Action for Equality, Support and Anti-racism (formerly ISAG), participated en mass by migrants.

The Social Welfare Services of the Ministry of Labour held a series of seminars on the EU acquis regarding discrimination on the grounds covered by the two directives, in the framework of a PROGRESS project running from 2008 to 2009 co-funded by the European Commission. The seminars took place in both urban and rural locations, which is a welcome innovation.

b) to encourage dialogue with NGOs with a view to promoting the principle of equal treatment (Article 12 Directive 2000/43 and Article 14 Directive 2000/78) and Generally speaking, on issues of policy making, consultation with NGOs is either poor or non-existing.

c) to promote dialogue between social partners to give effect to the principle of equal treatment within workplace practices, codes of practice, workforce monitoring (Article 11 Directive 2000/43 and Article 13 Directive 2000/78)

Dialogue with social partners on issues of discrimination at the workplace is lacking; no code of conduct has been agreed upon nor is there any system for workforce monitoring.

d) to specifically address the situation of Roma and Travellers

The government has not taken any measures to specifically target the Roma in terms of dissemination of information or dialogue.

The recognition in 2009 by the Cypriot government of the Roma as a minority within the meaning of the Framework Convention on National Minorities has not led to a change of policy or any measures to improve the situation of the Roma, a fact regretted by the Advisory Committee's Third Opinion on Cyprus published in 2010. The opinion states that the Roma continue to face serious prejudice and difficulties in many fields, such as employment, housing, education and access to health services, whilst the establishment of a dialogue between the government and the Roma remains problematic. The Committee urged the government to identify ways to establish a structured dialogue with the Roma and to obtain up-to-date information regarding their ethnic, linguistic and religious affiliation. The government responded by stating that "issues regarding the Cyprus Roma are part of the overall policy planning of the Government" without indicating any specific policies to address the problems highlighted.⁵⁹⁰ There are no Travellers in Cyprus.

8.2 Compliance (Article 14 Directive 2000/43, Article 16 Directive 2000/78)

- a) Are there mechanisms to ensure that contracts, collective agreements, internal rules of undertakings and the rules governing independent occupations, professions, workers' associations or employers' associations do not conflict with the principle of equal treatment? These may include general principles of the national system, such as, for example, "lex specialis derogat legi generali (special rules prevail over general rules) and lex posteriori derogat legi priori (more recent rules prevail over less recent rules).

The existing constitutional practice is such that any law or regulation contrary to the principle of equal treatment, as guaranteed by Article 28 of the Constitution, and the human rights sections of the constitution, is unconstitutional, as the principle underlies all relevant laws. Therefore, it is considered to be null and void and of no legal effect. However, in order to trigger this provision, an application must be filed in court by a person who has been wronged as a result of the implementation of a law which runs contrary to the Constitution, seeking to have the law declared unconstitutional. So far, no law has been declared unconstitutional by reason of non-compliance with the equality provision of the Constitution (article 28), except laws providing for positive action measures in favour of one vulnerable group.

The equality provisions contained in the international treaties, signed and ratified by the Republic, take precedence over any municipal law and therefore override any provisions that are contrary to the principle of equal treatment. Also, by virtue of a recent amendment of the Constitution, all EU Directives and regulations are deemed to take precedence over all domestic legislation including the Constitution itself.

⁵⁹⁰ The Third Opinion of the Advisory Committee is available at www.coe.int/t/dghl/monitoring/minorities/3_FCNMdocs/PDF_3rd_OP_Cyprus_en.pdf. The comments of the government of Cyprus on Third opinion are available at http://www.coe.int/t/dghl/monitoring/minorities/3_FCNMdocs/PDF_3rd_Com_Cyprus_en.pdf.

The mechanism under national law by which provisions in agreements, contracts or rules relating to professional activity, workers and employers that are contrary to the principle of equal treatment can be declared null and void or amended is contained in the law setting out the mandate of the equality body (Law N. 42(I)/2004).

The procedure described in article 39 of this law is for the equality body to refer to the Attorney General all laws, regulations and practices containing discrimination; the Attorney General is then obliged to advise the Minister concerned and prepare the necessary amendment in the discriminatory law or practice. The equality body's referrals to the Attorney General under article 39 are not always taken up and often laws and regulations containing discriminatory provisions remain unaltered as a result.

There is no procedure for a regular monitoring or screening of old or new laws, collective agreements, contracts or rules etc in order to ensure their compliance with the anti-discrimination laws. Practice shows that the procedure for assessing compliance of a particular law, contract, practice etc with the anti-discrimination laws is triggered off only when a specific complaint is submitted on this matter.

b) Are any laws, regulations or rules that are contrary to the principle of equality still in force?

Yes there are some, most notably advertisements for jobs in the public service which carry an age limit and job descriptions which require "excellent knowledge of Greek" as a prerequisite. Also, the Termination of Employment laws provide that persons reaching pensionable age lose their right to compensation as a result of unlawful dismissal; the equality body's recommendation that this provision be revised was not taken up. A revision of the Pensions Law in order to remove discriminatory provisions against younger persons wishing to take early retirement was recommended by the Equality Body in 2009 but was pursued by the Attorney General. There are also those cases where no complaint was submitted and thus no decision of the Equality body was issued for the need to repeal the discriminatory provisions.

9 CO-ORDINATION AT NATIONAL LEVEL

Which government department/ other authority is/ are responsible for dealing with or co-ordinating issues regarding anti-discrimination on the grounds covered by this report?

Is there an anti-racism or anti-discrimination National Action Plan ? If yes, please describe it briefly.

There is no single authority or Government department responsible for the overall coordination of the implementation measures under the newly enacted legislation. Several ministries are involved depending on the issue at stake: the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance deals with issues such as employment and social insurance benefits; the Ministry of Justice and Public Order deals with issues of legislation drafting and interpretation; the Ministry of Education and the Ministry of the Interior with their respective competencies. There is no anti-racism or anti-discrimination National Action Plan for any grounds other than gender. The annual reports of the Ministry of Justice and Public Order sum up the Ministry's activities in this field in coordinating the activities of the PROGRESS projects and in providing information that feeds into various national reports.⁵⁹¹
